OXFORD BOOKS FOR STUDENTS

 Anson's Law of Contract

Edited by A. G. GUEST

So rapid has been the development of the law of contract in the past five years that many traditional principles have undergone extensive change. The enactment of the Misrepresentation Act 1967, together with a number of important decisions of the House of Lords, have necessitated much new writing in this twenty-third edition of Sir William Anson's classic work. Now in its ninetieth year, Anson has consistently provided a clear and comprehensible statement of the law for students. Its long life is some indication of the extent to which it has answered their needs and difficulties; it is now available for the first time in a paper as well as in a cloth edition. A. G. Guest is Professor of English Law, King's College, London. Twenty-third edition 75/- net paper covers 38/- net

 Comparative Judicial Behaviour

GLENDON SCHUBERT and DAVID J. DANELSKI

This book is the first to focus cross-culturally on judicial decision-making, using theories and methods developed in the behavioural sciences. It contains a group of original empirical studies designed and carried out by authors who are political scientists or lawyers or both. Though there is an extensive literature on American courts and judges, and much of it from a behavioural point of view, very little work has been done on judicial behaviour in other cultures. The chapters on the Korean, Philippine, and Indian judiciaries are the first behavioural analyses of these subjects to be published anywhere, and with only a few exceptions, the same is true of Japan, Australia, and Canada. Glendon Schubert is at York University, Toronto; David J. Danelski is Associate Professor of Political Science, Yale University. 72/6 net

Precedent in English Law

RUPERT CROSS, Vinerian Professor of English Law, University of Oxford

Dr Goodhart said in 1948 that the English doctrine of precedent was more rigid than it ever had been in the past, and when the first edition of this book was being written between 1958 and 1960 that remained substantially true. The message of the second edition is that the doctrine of precedent is less rigid than ever before, the major pointer to that conclusion being the famous Practice Direction of the House of Lords of July 1966 in which the House asserted its power to reconsider its previous decisions. The Direction is discussed, together with several other indications of the loosening of the old rigidity of the English rules of precedent. An effort is made to collect together all the exceptions to the rule of stare decisis, but it is recognised that such an undertaking can never be definitive. History of the Law of Charity, 1532-1827

The Church under the Law

Justice, Administration and Discipline in the Diocese of York, 1560-1640

RONALD A. MARCHANT

Dr Marchant has produced the first systematic account of church courts as they were re-moulded to serve the Protestant Church in England after the Elizabethan Settlement, and at a time when they were still one of the principal responsibilities of bishops and archdeacons. This study is based on a detailed account of the courts in the diocese of York, but the author measures the individuality of the northern courts by constant reference to the typical southern diocese of Norwich. 75s. net

Milsom's Historical Foundations of the Common Law

1969. By S. F. C. MILSOM, F.B.A., Professor of Legal History in the University of London

More than any other branch of history, the history of the law suffers from being read backwards. The aim of this important book is to show the development of the common law from its starting point, avoiding the unconscious assumptions of a later age. The topics discussed are traditional, but it is not a traditional picture that emerges.
