

Psychopathic disorder and autistic spectrum disorders

Sir: As a child and adolescent psychiatrist I would like to support the observations of Galton & Crocombe (Psychiatric Bulletin, November 1999, 23, 692). Autistic spectrum disorders are becoming much more common and this is not just a reflection of more awareness. There has been a definite increase since 1979 in the diagnosis of children with this disorder and a very small minority of people with Asperger's syndrome do show very violent behaviour which is dangerous to others with no sense of remorse and no understanding that violence is wrong.

At present it is mainly child and adolescent psychiatrists who notice this increase, but many of these young people are now reaching adult age and will need to move on to adult services.

From our experience of working with children and young people I would very definitely feel that the service provision for individuals suffering from autistic spectrum disorders and psychopathic disorders should be quite different from provision for antisocial or dissocial personality disorders.

CPD – Module C

Sir: I have been in correspondence with Professor Katona and others regarding the College's Continuing Professional Development requirements and the difficulties of those of us who are neither currently in NHS posts or salaried posts in large private hospitals.

I am very pleased to see that the College wants to be as flexible as possible, for which I am personally grateful. I have been fortunate in being able to be involved in local NHS educational sessions, for which I am thankful to colleagues but I do wonder if there is any interest among those, for example, who work full-time in medico-legal work, occupational health or journalism, getting together on a regular, but reasonably infrequent basis, to enable relevant Module C requirements to be met.

I would welcome hearing from anybody interested in this proposal.

Treating offenders with personality disorder

Sir: Maden (Psychiatric Bulletin, December 1999, 23, 707–710) advocates that the concept of 'treatability' of psychopathic disorder "must go, before irreparable damage is done to psychiatry's public standing". He condemns psychiatrists who diagnose an untreatable personality disorder and conclude that supervision is impossible and leave a probation officer to carry out this supervision. By distancing ourselves from the concept of 'treatability' are we not becoming more concerned with public protection rather than treatment of patients?
