This new study provides a thorough exploration of the various legal issues that might impede timely implementation of solar technology and some suggested remedies that balance the private and public mechanisms for reducing the uncertainties of enjoying its benefits. Four suggested statutes are presented as means by which federal, state, and local governments can help implement this beneficial technology.

Summary of Contents:

Design of Solar Heating and Cooling

Efficiency of Solar Energy Systems

Role of the Federal Government

Relevant Legal Issues

Suggested Statutes

An Act to Establish a Solar Energy Development Commission

An Act to Authorize Solar-Skyspace Easements

An Act to Encourage the Use of Solar Energy Systems

An Act to Provide Real Property Tax and Income Tax

Incentives for Use of Solar Energy

A perceptive analysis of prepaid legal service plans

LEGAL SERVICE PLANS: APPROACHES TO REGULATION

By Werner Pfennigstorf and Spencer L. Kimball

This two-year study conducted by the American Bar Foundation under a grant from the National Science Foundation suggests answers to many of the unsettled issues concerning legal service plans that are facing the bar, consumers of legal services, sponsors of legal service plans, legislators, and regulators of such plans.

Prepaid legal service plans are new and complex. There is little experience on which to rely in regulating them. They bring together in a bewildering variety of combinations persons, organizations, and legal relationships that have traditionally been treated separately: the practice of law, labor relations, insurance institutions, and membership relations of many kinds.

These complicated, interwoven relationships are unraveled in the principal reports and background papers presented in Legal Service Plans: Approaches to Regulation.

Practicing attorneys and plan sponsors will benefit by gaining a better understanding of legal service plans that will enable them to respond more effectively to the needs of beneficiaries and to anticipate problems, dangers, and regulatory requirements.

Legislators and legal service plan regulators will find the conceptual framework to help them design and administer a system of regulation that protects consumers without discouraging innovation and experimentation in the delivery and financing of legal services.

Werner Pfennigstorf is Research Attorney, American Bar Foundation. Spencer L. Kimball is Professor of Law, University of Chicago, and Executive Director, American Bar Foundation.
