Editor

Raymond Grew, Department of History,
University of Michigan

Comparative Studies in Society and History is an international forum for the presentation and discussion of new research into problems of change and stability that recur in human societies through time or in the contemporary world. It sets up a working alliance between specialists in all branches of the social sciences and humanities. Debate and review articles bring the general reader in touch with current findings and issues. In each part, articles on a particular question are grouped together to stimulate comparison of diverse cases. Also included in each issue are "CSSH Notes" and book reviews.

Papers in Economics and Philosophy explore the foundations of economics as both a predictive/explanatory enterprise and a normative one. They examine the relevance of economic techniques, methods and conclusions to philosophical questions in ethics and social theory. The journal is designed to foster collaboration between economists and philosophers and to bridge the increasingly artificial boundaries between them. Each issue contains review essays, detailed book reviews, and continuing discussion on topics previously covered.

The Meaning of Money

The first full treatment in nearly a century of what money really does for us — and to us. Drawing on materials as varied as immigrant manuals, books on etiquette, and household budget studies, the author shows how people have invented their own forms of currency, differentiating the ways spending and saving takes place.

Exploring the Black Box

Technology, Economics, and History

Nathan Rosenberg

Presenting a unique account of how technological change is generated and the processes by which improved technologies are introduced, this text implies that such changes are often "path dependent" because they tend to be so strongly influenced by the sequence of events from which a new technology has emerged.

Home to Work

Motherhood and the Politics of Industrial Homework in the United States

Eileen Boris

Gender ideologies have shaped the battle over homework from the 1870s. But by the 1980s, the middle-class mother at the keyboard has replaced the victimized immigrant. This record of the voice of home-working women in the debate over their labor also provides an historical context to the Reaganite lifting of New Deal bans.

Forging Industrial Policy

The United States, Britain, and France in the Railway Age

Frank Dobbin

To understand the origins of industrial policies in U.S., France, and Britain, Dobbin examines the evolution of public policies governing the railroads. The author challenges conventional thinking in economics, political science, and sociology by arguing that cultural meaning plays an important role in the development of purportedly rational policies designed to promote industrial growth.
