CONTENTS

	PAGE
Judging the Security Council	Jose E. Alvarez 1
The possibility that the World Court might "judicially review" Security Council actions has prompted a debate between legalists and realists. Professor Alvarez challenges the premises and choices presented to date, arguing that the Court is neither the ultimate savior of the United Nations nor its potential destroyer. Instead, he concludes that the World Court is one of many potential fora for (de)legitimation and may play a crucial role when it reviews "in an expressive mode."
Awarding Interest in International Arbitration	John Y. Gotanda 40
Resolving compensatory interest claims in international arbitrations is frequently complicated, time-consuming and expensive and typically results in inconsistent and arbitrary, as well as costly, awards. Professor Gotanda examines the practice of awarding such interest and offers a new approach that would provide arbitrators with clear and uniform guidelines to evaluate interest claims, bring consistency and predictability to the area, and enable the transnational contracting parties to resolve their disputes more equitably and efficiently.
