DEMOGRAPHY OF THE DOBE !KUNG

By NANCY HOWELL

A Volume in the POPULATION AND SOCIAL STRUCTURE: ADVANCES IN HISTORICAL DEMOGRAPHY Series

This volume represents an empirical study of the demographic processes—fertility, mortality and marriage patterns—of the !Kung, a contemporary hunting and gathering population in the Kalahari desert of Botswana. Stable population theory is used as a framework for construction of an overall view of the functioning of this remote group, examining the implications of parameters for long-run stability and evidence for recent change caused by contact. Computer microsimulation is used to examine interactions of variables, and to estimate the expected amount of stochastic fluctuation. The population presents a consistent picture of a nearly stationary population, with a low level of natural fertility. Causes of low fertility are sought in the diet and activity patterns of women engaged in the activities of hunting and gathering life, and evidence for increased fertility with sedentarization and increased fatness is discussed. Implications of the demographic patterns of the !Kung for their kinship relationships and for genetic transmission are discussed.
