"NATURE" said of the 1905 issue—

"A place should be found for this Year Book on the writing table of every astronomer and meteorologist, and the volume should be available for ready reference in laboratories and schools where science is studied. . . . It is very convenient to have all these matters brought together so handily for reference and record; and we have no hesitation in saying that all who are interested in natural phenomena or concerned with scientific progress will find this Year Book of great service."
