

EDITORIAL COMMENT

The Election of 1972: You Read it Here Last. With each passing presidential election, larger and larger bodies of public opinion data are collected—and by more and different sorts of people. The Review has frequently published the results of election studies done by our colleagues at the University of Michigan which through the years has focused the efforts of academics from many institutions. David Broder of the Washington Post suggested to us that when we presented the Michigan Center for Political Studies 1972 findings, we might also gather up comments and analyses from students having access to public opinion data originally generated in behalf of the McGovern and Nixon candidacies. The result of our followup has borne the fruit visible in the current issue, a symposium unusually complex and difficult to put together analyzing the 1972 presidential election just in time for the 1976 election. Art may or may not imitate life; we couldn't say. We do note, however, that social science tags along after real life at a respectful distance—in this case, four years.

Good Advice Needed. Now is a good time to remind readers that if they have suggestions or ideas to improve the Review, the transition period between managing editors is a strategic moment to let fly. Our successors in Pittsburgh are far more receptive and open minded than the barnacle-encrusted current management is likely to be. If you write, please do not omit a word of good cheer and commiseration, since a good part of the energies of any new administration must go into cleaning out the cobwebs neglected by the old.

Already improvements have been made in the processing of manuscripts. Prospective contributors should attend to the new instructions, printed in each issue, which, if followed, will cut costs without attenuating service to authors or readers. Good ideas like that are what we are after.
