The End

Hamburg 1943

Hans Erich Nossack

*Translated and with a Foreword by Joel Agee
With Photographs by Erich Andres*

“Nossack was the only writer of the time to try recording what he actually saw as plainly as possible,” writes W. G. Sebald about this memoir of the firebombing of Hamburg in 1943. Nossack watched the destruction of his city—in the first firestorm achieved by Allied bombers—from across the Elbe River. Only three months after the event, he completed The End, one of the most remarkable literary responses to the phenomenon of total destruction.

The Dark Gaze

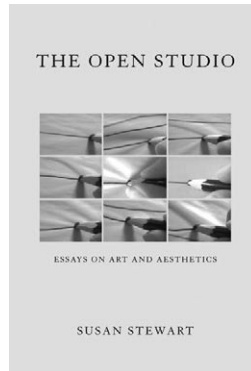

Maurice Blanchot and the Sacred

Kevin Hart

“The repeated claim to atheism and even the banality of the ‘death of God’ have proved unable to quench the question of God. This is the lesson taught by Blanchot and his circle. At least, it is what Kevin Hart’s astonishing scholarship and genuine spiritual insight have allowed him to demonstrate for the first time with such authority.”

Essays on Art and Aesthetics

Susan Stewart

“Susan Stewart’s penetrating insight into individual works of art and the compelling narratives she weaves from this into the intention underpinning a particular artist’s practice or a thematic topic never fail to engage me. Her writings, limpid and clear, while diverse in tone, structure, and mode, are for me amongst the most compelling and enduring on contemporary art in recent years.”

J. M. Coetzee and the Ethics of Reading

Literature in the Event

Derek Attridge

“A bracing account of Coetzee’s writing as exemplary of the singularity of literature. Derek Attridge stresses the special ethical importance of the power of literature to express the apprehensions and intimations of human consciousness. This is the best work on J. M. Coetzee to date. It will prove to be a benchmark of criticism on an author of lasting importance.”

A Sense of Things

The Object Matter of American Literature

Bill Brown

“Bill Brown takes up the story of commodification and its discontents as it reaches a climax of a kind in America in the 1880s and 1890s. . . . Although Brown is by no means the first to argue that literature can ‘redeem’ the material world from commodification, he does so engagingly, with ingenuity, tact, and an admirable breadth of reference. . . .

[This book] combines fresh thinking about literary texts with scrupulous attention both to historical context and to a wide range of speculative effort, from Thoreau through Simmel, Benjamin and Lukacs to Adorno and Lacan.”

Works of Hesiod and the Homeric Hymns

Edited and translated by Daryl Hine

“It’s a treasure to have this book, retrieving for us from ancient days the Homeric Hymns and the poems of Hesiod, because the work of translation has been done so lucidly and well by this distinguished poet.”
