

During the past ten years the Oxford Art Journal has acquired an international reputation for publishing innovative critical work in art history. The Journal represents a diversity of theoretical and political concerns. At the same time, it questions the easy going pluralism that forecloses understanding of the real difficulties involved in analysing art and culture.

The Oxford Art Journal addresses artists, academics, students, and teachers, including specialists and non-specialists, in the belief that a radical re-examination of the visual arts has a broad cultural significance.

The Journal publishes both thematic and non-thematic issues, and continues to include articles on contemporary art practice and cultural production as well as on historical topics. The Reviews Section functions as a forum for extended critical discussion of current publications and exhibitions.
