
About the Authors

Gregory A. Caldeira is Professor of Political Science at Ohio State University. His current research focuses on the role and impact of organized interests in the formation of the U.S. Supreme Court's agenda, the rise of organized conflict over nominations to the federal courts, the representation of organized interests in the courts, and stability and change in the salience and legitimacy of high courts, especially in the European Communities. He has written on law, courts, and various features of American politics, including recent publications in the American Political Science Review, American Journal of Political Science, and the Journal of Politics.

David M. Engel is Professor of Law and Director of the Baldy Center for Law and Social Policy at the State University of New York at Buffalo. His research explores law, culture, and social change in Southeast Asia, particularly Thailand, and in a midwestern American community. His recent writing have also addressed issues of rights and difference in the lives of children with disabilities and their families.

Lee Epstein is Professor and chair of the Department of Political Science at Washington University in St. Louis. She is the co-author of The Supreme Court and Legal Change and editor of Contemplating Courts. Her current research applies rational choice theory to judicial decisions.

James L. Gibson is Distinguished University Professor of Political Science at the University of Houston. In addition to his work on the legitimacy of political and legal institutions, his current research focuses broadly on the causes and consequences of democratization. He is currently completing projects on law and legal consciousness in seven countries, the consolidation of democracy in Russia, and the initiation of democratic reform in South Africa.

Robert Granfield is Assistant Professor of Sociology at the University of Denver. He is the author of Making Elite Lawyers: Visions of Law at Harvard and Beyond and several articles on law school socialization, legal profession, and drug policy. His current research is in the areas of legal ethics, drug courts, and the social construction of at-risk youth. He is currently writing a Law and Society text with Nancy Reichman.

Jack Knight is Associate Professor of Political Science at Washington University in St. Louis. He has written extensively on rules and their effects on social life and is the author of Institutions and Social Conflict. Among his current projects is a book-length manuscript, co-authored with Lee Epstein, offering a rational choice account of Supreme Court decisionmaking.

Robert MacCoun is Associate Professor of Public Policy at the University of California at Berkeley. Prior to joining the Berkeley faculty, he was a behavioral scientist in the Criminal Justice Program and the Institute for Civil Justice at RAND. He has published articles on jury decisionmaking, alternative dispute resolution, drug dealing, and drug laws in Science, Psychological Bulletin, Law & Society Review, Law & Human Behavior, and other journals.

Frank W. Munger is Professor of Law and Adjunct Professor of Sociology at the State University of New York at Buffalo. He is past general editor of the Law & Society Review. His current research examines contemporary poverty policy, the working poor, and the informal economy. Recent writings address, among other topics, the concept of class in sociolegal research, the law and society movement, judicial impact statements, and the evolving class structures of law practice in an Appalachian community.

Brian Z. Tamanaha is an Assistant Professor at St. John's University School of Law, where he teaches legal theory, comparative law, and torts. He has published a number of articles in legal theory, law and the social sciences, and law and development, and a book drawing from all three areas, entitled Understanding Law in Micronesia: An Interpretive Approach to Transplanted Law (1993).