

ABOUT THE AUTHORS

LARRY R. BAAS is an instructor of Political Science at Kent State University. His primary interests are in the areas of political behavior and judicial process. He is currently working on research testing and the existence of a general judicial role, utilizing Q-Technique as a method for analysis.

WILLIAM J. BOWERS is Director of the Russell B. Stearns Study, a center for the study of youth at Northeastern University. His academic interests include the sociology of deviant behavior and social control, youth studies, and research methodology. He is presently engaged in research on the relationship between crime and punishment in the case of homicide.

ROBERT A. CARP is an Assistant Professor of Political Science at the University of Houston, where he also serves as Director of Graduate Studies and Chairman of the Graduate Committee. He is the author of several papers and articles dealing with district judges and circuit courts.

WALTER D. CONNOR is an Assistant Professor of Sociology and an Associate of the Center for Russian and East European Studies at the University of Michigan. His article in this issue is based on research conducted in the Criminal Law Department of Moscow State University in 1969. More detailed treatment of crime and correctional policies in the USSR is presented in his book, Deviance in Soviet Society: Crime, Delinquency and Alcoholism (New York Columbia University Press, 1972).

LLOYD W. KLEMKE received his Ph.D. at the University of Oregon in 1969 and since that time has been an Assistant Professor of Sociology at Oregon State University. His areas of special interest include deviant behavior with an emphasis on juvenile delinquency and the sociology of education.

RICHARD SALEM, a past Research Associate of the Russell B. Stearns Study, is currently studying for his doctorate in Sociology at Ohio State University. His major academic interests are in deviant behavior, the sociology of law, the sociology of education, and computer methods. He is currently involved in research on the influence of formal organizational structure of the college or university on the development of student subcultures.

ROBERT B. SEIDMAN is a Professor of Law at the University of Wisconsin Law School. He practiced law for 14 years before entering teaching. He taught law in Africa for six years and now teaches courses in African Law and Social Change and in Law and Development. He served as co-director of the University of Wisconsin Summer Institute in Law and Development in 1971 and his publications include A Sourcebook of the Criminal Law in Africa (London: Sweet and Maxwell, 1966).

BERNARD A. THORSELL received his Ph.D. in Sociology from the University of Illinois in 1958. He has been an Associate Professor of Sociology at San Fernando Valley State College since 1963. His special interests include deviant behavior, the sociology of human values, and social psychology. He is presently at work on a book on the sociology of social problems.

THOMAS D. UNGS is a Professor and head of the Department of Political Science at the University of Tennessee. Among his published works is American Political Patterns (Boston: Little, Brown, Second Edition 1969), of which he is co-author with Dan D. Niemmo. His primary areas of interest are judicial process and behavior and constitutional law. He is currently working in the area of methodological techniques in the measurement of political consensus.