How to Select a Publisher in Political Science

Christopher J. Kelaher, The American University Press
Edward Artinian, Chatham House Publishers

The questions most frequently asked of editors are "How do I get my book published?" and "Who should I talk to about my manuscript or project?" To help prospective authors, we have compiled the following list of publishers and editors working in political science. Criteria for inclusion in this list are attendance and exhibits at major academic meetings and advertising in publications such as the American Political Science Review.

We have also identified some practical questions for an author to ask when seeking a publisher. The answers to such inquiries can reveal a great deal about an editor's expectations for a project, its anticipated market, and the publisher's marketing approach. Such questions are:

1. What market(s) does the editor expect to reach with the project? Course adoptions? At what level(s)? Single-copy sales to libraries or to professionals?
2. How many copies would be printed, in cloth and in paper?
3. What would the price(s) be?
4. What is the publisher's policy on review copies and exam copies?

In addition to speaking with an editor, authors should examine a publisher's frontlist and backlist, marketing materials, and exhibits. These can be valuable indicators of a company's products, approach, and effectiveness.

In order to sharpen the usefulness of our list, we asked two important questions of our informants:

1. "If we code the market segments as (1) freshman; (2) sophomore; (3) junior; (4) senior; (5) masters; and (6) doctoral, indicate the major markets for your books."
2. "We are known by the books that we have published in the past and would like to publish in the future. List three titles that you have worked on or have been responsible for, either at your current position or a previous one, in the past five years."

We hope this information will be helpful and that it will save both authors and publishers time, money, and effort. Because publishers and editors enter and leave the field with surprising frequency, our list cannot be static and we cannot vouch for its long-term inclusiveness. We regret any omissions and promise to amend future lists as further information is received.

About the Authors

Christopher J. Kelaher did his undergraduate work at the University of Dayton and received a master's degree in political science from the University of Wisconsin.

Edward Artinian has been a member of APSA since 1961; he did his undergraduate work at Brown University and received a master's degree in business from Columbia University.

Both gratefully acknowledge the contributions of Catherine Coy of the University of Chicago, who tracked down the elusive editors and pressed them by fax for the relevant information.
