

Democratic Equality for Washington, D.C.!

Elliot Mamet

The political status of Washington, D.C., is a longstanding question in American political thought. Intervening in that debate, I argue that Washington, D.C. deserves democratic equality. Democratic equality entails that, at a minimum, D.C. residents should have the power to vote for representatives in national and local legislatures (like residents of the several states), that their vote should have equal weight to others, and that D.C.'s elected legislative representatives should have power to vote on what the law is. This ideal of democratic equality for D.C. is only possible via D.C. statehood. Drawing on original archival research, the article provides a historical overview of D.C.'s democratic disenfranchisement, outlines three principal forms of democratic inequality faced by D.C. residents, and imagines what democratic equality for D.C. might look like. It concludes by sketching a broader research agenda about the democratic injustices accorded to those Americans living outside the several states.

On a blustery March morning in 2023, a coalition called #HandsOffDC held a rally outside Union Station in Washington, D.C. The rally was organized to protest Congressional interference in D.C. affairs. That afternoon, the U.S. Senate was scheduled to vote on a resolution nullifying D.C.'s revised criminal code.¹ A crowd of 200 protestors held signs that read “D.C. Statehood is Racial Justice,” “Hands Off D.C.,” and “Shame on faithless POTUS, rabid GOP, tyrannical Congress, and spineless Dems.” D.C.'s longtime delegate to Congress, Eleanor Holmes Norton, who serves in Congress without a vote, addressed the crowd.

We have come together today with one simple message for Congress and President Biden: keep your hands off D.C. You either support D.C. home rule or you don't. There are no exceptions and there is no middle ground on D.C.'s right to self-government.

Norton went on to lambast D.C.'s lack of democratic equality:

What is happening in Congress is undemocratic. None of the 535 voting members of Congress were elected by D.C. residents. None of them are accountable to D.C. residents. Yet if they vote in favor of the disapproval resolution, they are choosing to substitute their policy judgments for the judgment of D.C.'s elected leaders. They will choose to govern D.C. without its consent. The nearly 700,000 D.C. residents, a majority of whom are Black and Brown, are worthy and capable of self-government (Norton 2023).

After the rally, supporters holding D.C. statehood signs marched to the Senate office complexes. 17 were arrested (Zets 2023; Otten 2023; Portnoy, Silverman, and Flynn 2023). Nonetheless, the Senate voted 81-14-1 to nullify D.C.'s revised criminal code. Two days later, Speaker McCarthy held a raucous enrollment ceremony for the resolution in Statuary Hall.² President Biden signed the resolution into law on March 20, 2023, marking a low point in Washington, D.C.'s centuries-long quest for local self-governance and equal citizenship.

Washington, D.C. is a constitutional anomaly. Neither a state, nor a territory, the residents of D.C. are under the yoke of the federal government—all while lacking voting representation in the House, any representation in the Senate, and full local self-governance. Every word of D.C. code, down to its traffic laws, can be nullified by Congress; its federal taxes, imposed and spent by unaccountable, unelected super-legislators from the several states; its residents, though greater in population than several states, denied voting representation in the House and any representation in the Senate; its local crimes prosecuted by an unelected and unaccountable U.S. Attorney. That D.C., or “Chocolate City,” is plurality Black and majority non-white renders it an important edge case of American democratic principles. As Frederick Douglass once wondered, “what have the people of the District done that they should be excluded from the ballot box?” (1895).

This article contributes to an ongoing scholarly conversation about D.C. and democracy. Recent scholarship has broken new ground in analyzing constitutional questions surrounding D.C.'s democratic status (Bulman-Pozen and Johnson 2022) and in explicating the long fight for democratic governance in the District of Columbia

Elliot Mamet  is a Postdoctoral Research Associate and Lecturer at the Princeton School of Public and International Affairs (emamet@princeton.edu, USA).

doi:10.1017/S1537592725000349

© The Author(s), 2025. Published by Cambridge University Press on behalf of American Political Science Association. This is an Open Access article, distributed under the terms of the Creative Commons Attribution licence (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0>), which permits unrestricted re-use, distribution and reproduction, provided the original article is properly cited.

(Masur 2010; Pearlman 2019; Musgrove and Asch 2021; Sommers 2023; Kumfer 2024). Building on this literature, this article makes three key contributions. First, the article situates the democratic status of D.C. as a live question throughout the tradition of American political thought. Various thinkers in that tradition, including Thomas Jefferson, James Madison, Frederick Douglass, Mary Church Terrell, Martin Luther King, Jr., Jesse Jackson, Eleanor Holmes Norton, Jamin Raskin, and more, have all considered the peculiar political status of the District, and connected D.C.'s status with American political ideals. Second, the article draws on democratic theory to sketch a case for D.C. statehood and autonomy. It imagines what the institutional consequences of democratic equality might look like both in Congress and in D.C. local government. Third, the article contributes to a burgeoning literature highlighting how the American polity has been shaped by a division between states and non-states in the federal system (Frymer 2017; Moore 2017; Sparrow 2017; Immerwahr 2019). The example of D.C. underscores how residents of Washington, D.C. and the U.S. territories lack equal standing in important respects to those living in the states—with profound democratic consequences.

The article proceeds as follows. First, I survey D.C.'s long history of democratic disenfranchisement. Second, I outline three principal forms of democratic disenfranchisement faced by D.C. residents: in its limited local self-government, votelessness in the House, and voicelessness in the Senate. Third, I present an argument that D.C. deserves democratic equality and respond to the most persuasive objections. Fourth, I imagine what democratic equality for D.C. would look like in practical terms. And last, I propose a broader research agenda about the democratic injustices accorded to Americans living outside the several states. In addition to Washington, D.C., the territories of American Samoa, Guam, the Northern Mariana Islands, Puerto Rico, and the U.S. Virgin Islands are all located on the U.S. democratic periphery, and the residents of those territories also confront acute democratic inequalities. Political science ought to better confront the state-centered boundaries of U.S. politics, boundaries which create an enduring inequality between states and non-states in American democratic life.

The Historical Development of Democratic Inequality in Washington, D.C.

Washington, D.C. is a jurisdiction unlike any other in the United States. The Constitution gives Congress plenary power “to exercise exclusive Legislation in all Cases whatsoever, over such District (not exceeding ten Miles square) as may, by Cession of particular States, and the Acceptance of Congress, become the Seat of the Government of the United States.”³ Uncontemplated in this so-called “District Clause” is the status of those persons who live in D.C., a problem that continues to dog Washington D.C. today.

In Federalist No. 43, James Madison argues that exclusive federal control of the federal district is necessary. A federal capital, he argues, would prevent “a dependence of the members of the general government on the state comprehending the seat of government” (Carey and McClellan 2001, 223). Madison feared the dependence of a federal capital on any given state. His apprehension dates to the young nation's experience in 1783, when veterans from the Continental Army protested outside a Congress of the Confederation meeting in the Pennsylvania State House in Philadelphia (Bowling 1977, 30–35; Gallagher 1995). The so-called “Philadelphia Mutiny” pressured Madison, Jefferson, and Washington to give the nation's capital a seat of government under federal, not state, control (Cobb 1995, 529–57). Even while insisting on federal control of the federal district, Madison also asserted the need for local self-governance for the residents of that district. As he wrote in Federalist No. 43, the inhabitants of the federal district “will have had their voice in the election of the government, which is to exercise authority over them ... a municipal legislature for local purposes, derived from their own suffrages, will of course be allowed them” (Carey and McClellan 2001, 223). His was an image of D.C. being nearly democratically equal with the states.

Indeed, from 1790–1801, eligible D.C. residents could vote for Members of Congress from Maryland or Virginia. In 1801, however, Congress passed the District of Columbia Organic Act, making D.C. the national capital—and depriving D.C. residents of any Representative in Congress (Raven-Hansen 1975, 174; Musgrove and Asch 2021, 5–11). The Congressional debate over the Organic Act reflects the unease many felt toward stripping D.C. residents of their political voice. As Representative John Bacon said, “here the citizens would be governed by laws, in the making of which they have no voice—by laws not made with their own consent, but by the United States for them—by men who have not the interest in the laws made that legislators ought always to possess—by men also not acquainted with the minute and local interests of the place.”⁴ In a pattern that would repeat itself again and again, Congress acted to curtail democracy for D.C.

Political power came to D.C. in fits and starts. In 1820, white male D.C. voters gained the right to elect the mayor directly. Their voting rights were quickly taken away, however, when Thomas Carberry, who favored expanding suffrage, was elected mayor. Fearful of overextending the vote, the city council passed a “hundred dollar law” restricting voting in D.C. to white men with substantial property. In 1830, Andrew Jackson became the first president to call for a nonvoting delegate seat for D.C.—to no avail.⁵ Congress did not restore broader suffrage and lift the property-owning requirement until 1848 (Asch and Musgrove 2017, 66). In 1846, Congress retroceded Alexandria County to the Commonwealth of Virginia, which gave newfound democratic rights to white men in Alexandria, while further cementing the slave power.

During the turbulent period leading to and during the Civil War, D.C. was a laboratory for national disputes over race and democracy. Slavery was abolished in D.C. in 1862 under the D.C. Emancipation Act, which provided payment to enslavers of $300 each “for each person shown to have been so held by lawful claim” (District of Columbia Compensated Emancipation Act of 1862, 12 Stat. 376 § 3). Black men in Washington gained the vote in 1867 with the passage of the District of Columbia Suffrage Act, a law passed over the veto of President Johnson and over the objection of nearly all white D.C. voters in a referendum on the question (Ingle 1893, 65; Asch and Musgrove 2017, 141–46).

D.C. residents briefly had local democracy during Reconstruction, from 1871–1874. Under Mayor Sayles J. Bowlen, the city passed a law banning discrimination in places of public entertainment. Black D.C. residents held positions as ward commissioners, firemen, and police. D.C. residents could also elect a nonvoting delegate to Congress. Norton P. Chipman, a Republican and ally of Frederick Douglass, represented the District as a delegate to Congress from 1871 until 1875 (Du Bois 2014 [1935], 461–63; Whyte 1958; Masur 2010, 214–56; Asch and Musgrove 2017, 152–68). During his brief tenure, Chipman advocated for increased self-governance for the district. “I believe the people here,” he said, “are as competent to determine what is to their interest as the people of any other community.”⁶ He also commented on the oddity of being a nonvoting member of Congress. Chipman viewed the role of nonvoting member as “peculiar ... and totally distinct from that of a Representative in Congress who has a vote To be successful he must avoid antagonism in the House of Representatives, and bend his whole efforts to the measures immediately concerning his constituents.”⁷

But the experiment in democracy for D.C. was not to last. Congress, outraged by profligate public works spending by the D.C. territorial government, revoked local self-government in D.C. in 1874. This decision ended D.C.’s experiment in local democracy and quashed Black political power (Piper 1944, 90–133; Harrison 2006; Masur 2010, 248–56). No longer could D.C. residents vote for their elected leaders; instead, the city would be managed by three appointed commissioners. “For the first time in its history,” Sam Smith writes (1974, 46), “the District became an unadulterated colony of the United States.” The District was not to regain limited local self-governance and nonvoting representation in Congress until nearly a century later (Musgrove and Asch 2021, 165–68).

The treatment of Washington, D.C. bothered Frederick Douglass. Douglass, who late in life served as marshal and recorder of deeds for the District of Columbia, wrote about the “anomalous condition” of D.C. residents in his third autobiography.⁸ As Douglass notes,

These people are outside of the United States. They occupy neutral ground and have no political existence. They have neither voice nor vote in all practical politics of the United States. They are hardly to be called citizens of the United States. Practically they are aliens; not citizens, but subjects. The District of Columbia is the one spot where there is no government for the people, of the people, and by the people. Its citizens submit to rulers whom they have had no choice in selecting. They obey laws which they had no voice in making. They have plenty of taxation, but no representation. In the great questions of politics in the country they can march with neither army, but are relegated to the position of neutrals. (Douglass 1994 [1893], 960)

D.C. residents both live in the capital, yet also “outside of the United States” as Douglass points out. To be taxed without representation, to be bound by coercive federal laws for which no representative could vote, to be under the yoke of unelected and unaccountable federal officials—this is what Douglass means by “aliens; not citizens, but subjects.” The democratic problem Douglass identifies remains in place for Washingtonians today—the people living in the capital of a democracy “have no political existence,” governed by those who they did not elect and bound by laws to which neither D.C. residents nor their elected representatives had any ultimate say.

For nearly a century, D.C. residents lacked any vote whatsoever, a political situation which disenfranchised scores of Black citizens. “Surely nowhere in the world do oppression and persecution based solely on the color of the skin appear more hateful and hideous than in the capital of the United States,” wrote Mary Church Terrell, “because the chasm between the principles upon which this Government was founded, in which it still professes to believe, and those which are daily practiced under the protection of the flag, yawns so wide and deep” (1907, 186). Unlike the territories in the contiguous United States that typically became states under the provisions of the Northwest Ordinance, D.C. remained in limbo.⁹ The failure of Congress to grant D.C. statehood was in line with broader partisan and racial logic central to the statehood process.¹⁰

It wasn’t until 1961 when D.C. residents gained the right to vote for president and vice president with the ratification of the Twenty-third Amendment. The Twenty-third Amendment was only a partial expansion of political rights for D.C. residents, however. Because D.C. is not a state, its residents lack equal power to vote for president. The amendment’s original Senate-passed language would have provided D.C. with the same number of electors as if it were a state, but a House amendment changed that language to specify the number of electors be “in no event more than the least populous State.” In practical terms, this reduced D.C.’s voting power from five electors to three in 1964, giving it unequal political power in the selection of the president compared with the states of equivalent population (McMurtry 1977, 15–18).¹¹ According to the Washington Post, the stipulation limiting D.C.’s electors to that of the least populous state was part of an “unspoken bipartisan reluctance to grant broader suffrage to a city with a Negro majority” (Mintz 1960). No Southern or border state ratified the Twenty-third Amendment except Tennessee (Derthick 1962, 73–74).¹²

The Twenty-third Amendment provides only incomplete power for D.C. residents to select the president. Its passage increased the total electoral votes from 535 to 538, making a tie in the electoral college possible—yet if there is a tie, Washington D.C. would be excluded from the contingent election to select the president and vice president (U.S. Const. art. II, § 1, cl. 3; see also Neale 2020, 14). If there are objections to the counting of electoral votes from one or more states or from the District of Columbia, D.C.’s delegate is unable to vote on objections to the counting of electoral votes under the Electoral Count Act (3 U.S.C. § 15). D.C. is also structurally excluded from determining qualifications for office. Under Trump v. Anderson 601 U.S. 100 (2024), Congress (consisting of Representatives and Senators—not Delegates) retains exclusive power to enforce the insurrectionist qualification (Fourteenth Amendment § 3). In all these ways, while D.C. residents may vote for president, their power to select the president is structurally inferior to the residents of the several states.

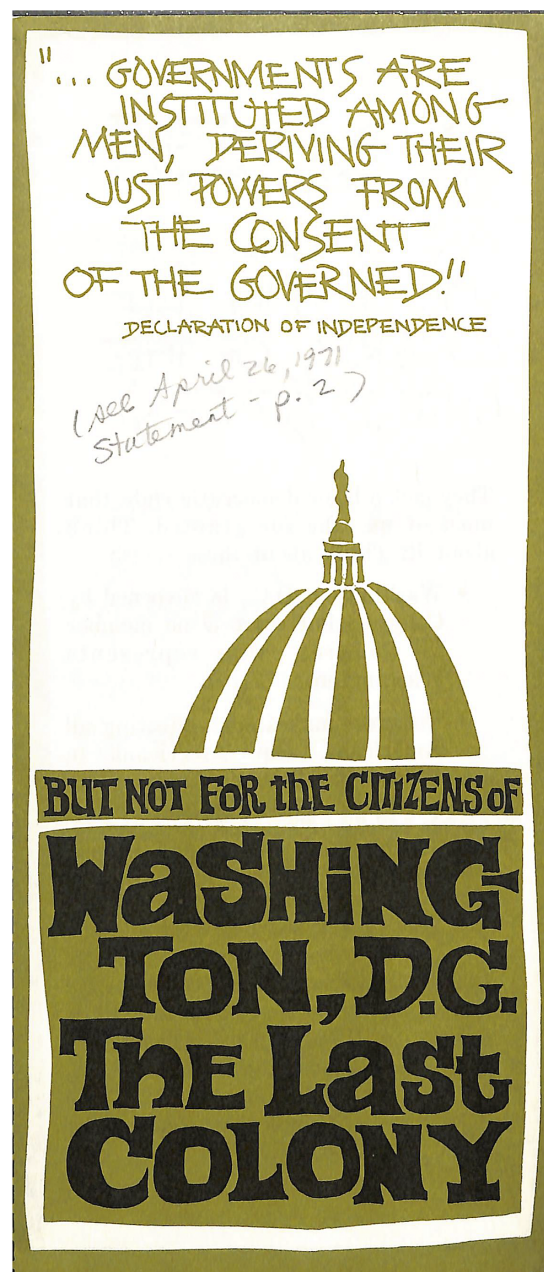

Short of statehood, D.C. lacks broader powers granted to states and their elected representatives. It cannot ratify constitutional amendments, even amendments that directly affect D.C. residents (U.S. Const. art. V). It has no say in admitting new states into the Union (U.S. Const. art. IV, § 3, cl. 1). As I show next, it is dogged by three key structural inequalities that stem from its non-state status under the Constitution—in its local government, the House, and the Senate.

Three Forms of Contemporary Democratic Inequality

In this section, I outline three principal forms of democratic inequality faced by D.C. residents. It is worth noting at the outset that D.C. residents have continuously made their demands by invoking the American democratic tradition. In the March 2023 rally at Union Station, Eleanor Holmes Norton argued that those members of Congress who legislate on D.C. without giving D.C. a vote “choose to govern D.C. without its consent” (Norton 2023).

For those residents of the several states, some kind of democratic say, however partial, is proffered through periodic elections whereby voters choose in competitive elections who will represent them as a lawmaker. By contrast, D.C. residents are unable to elect voting members of Congress who can, in a formal sense, have a say in what the law is. The residents of the several states and territories, with exceptions, also have full local self-government.¹³ The residents of D.C. do not. Local laws enacted by their duly elected local government can be nullified by an unelected and unaccountable Congress. These deficiencies, alongside D.C.'s limited self-government and second-class status in Congress, render the status quo a suboptimal solution to D.C.'s democratic deficit. I expand on these democratic deficiencies in the following section.

Figure 1
League of Women Voters brochure, circa 1970s

Source: League of Women Voters Brochure, circa 1970s. In the National Archives, Washington, D.C., RG 233, Records of the U.S. House of Representatives, 93rd Congress, Committee on the District of Columbia, Box 22 - Legislative Files, H.R. 9056, H.R. 9598, H.R. 9617, Folder - Home Rule Documents Pre-1973, Incl. Hoover.

D.C.'s Home Rule: Limited Self-Government

Congress granted D.C. limited home rule in 1973 when it passed the District of Columbia Self-Government and Governmental Reorganization Act (Fauntroy 2003, 40–58; Asch and Musgrove 2017, 376–82; Pearlman 2019, 200–202). The passage of that law, commonly known as the Home Rule Act, was a major victory for the civil rights movement. During a visit to the District, for example, Martin Luther King Jr. had urged an “all-out nonviolent movement for home rule,” saying that “You don’t have freedom in Washington ... because you can’t vote.” He continued, “If you don’t know why they don’t want you to vote, I’ll tell you. It’s because the District of Columbia is 55 to 60 per cent Negro, and they know you will elect some Negroes to high public office” (New York Times 1965; see also Campbell and Shoenfeld 2021).

Home rule marked a high point of local autonomy for the District. It granted D.C. self-government for the first time since Reconstruction. Its passage was spurred on by the changing composition of Congress after the 1965 Voting Rights Act, which had increased the ability of Black people to vote in the South. Organized by Walter Fauntroy and other veterans of the civil rights movement, Black voters defeated John McMillan (D-SC), the openly bigoted chair of the House District Committee, propelling the House to pass a home rule bill, which was signed into law on December 24, 1973 (Mamet 2021, 400–404). Its passage was also spurred on by President Lyndon Johnson’s decision to grant D.C. an appointed City Council in 1967, by Congress’s creation of an elected D.C. school board in 1968, and by the 1968 violent unrest that decimated the city (Lester 2003, 194–95; Asch and Musgrove 2017, 351–54; Pearlman 2019, 43–50; Sommers 2023, 157–59).

Yet the Home Rule Act was also a limited victory. The law specified that Congress “reserves the right, at any time, to exercise its constitutional authority as legislature for the District.”¹⁴ The law also requires all enacted D.C. law to be transmitted to Congress for a period of 30 or 60 days, whereby Congress can vote on resolution to disapprove a D.C. law. Since the Home Rule Act was enacted in 1973, eleven separate disapproval resolutions have received floor consideration. Four were enacted into law (Jaroscak, Davis, and Leubsdorf 2024, 7–8).

D.C.’s limited local self-government exemplifies profound democratic inequalities. Disapproval resolutions, by nature, mark decisions about local D.C. affairs made by 535 legislators who are neither elected by nor answerable to D.C. residents. Beyond disapproval resolutions under the Home Rule Act, Congress interferes in D.C. affairs through authorization language which restricts or over- turns D.C. law, and policy riders attached to appropriations bills, overriding D.C. law on issues ranging from abortion and needle exchange to traffic cameras and right turns on red. For example, in the first session of the 118th Congress, House Republicans attached an array of policy riders to the D.C. appropriations bill, including language banning marijuana legalization (the “Harris rider”), banning D.C.’s needle exchange program, and “prevent[ing] D.C. from prohibiting motorists from making right turns on red.”¹⁵ Self-governance is contained in other important ways, too. Adult felonies in D.C. are prosecuted by an unelected U.S. attorney. Persons convicted of state-level offenses are not incarcerated in D.C. but instead housed in federal Bureau of Prisons facilities across 33 states (Cooper 2018). The D.C. National Guard, unlike any other National Guard units, is under the direct control of the president, not the locally-elected D.C. mayor (Flynn and Brice-Saddler 2021). The president may also federalize the D.C. Metropolitan Police Department (Hermann and Stein 2024). Even local zoning decisions are made by the National Capital Planning Commission, where most seats are not controlled by D.C. residents.

All three tools—disapproval resolutions under the Home Rule Act, authorizing language, and appropriations riders—are used by Congress to attempt to interfere in D.C.’s democratically-elected government. As one account put it, “throughout its history, the District of Columbia government has been changed, studied, supported, criticized, financed, debated, expanded, and reorganized—but all under the control of the U.S. Congress” (Thornell 1990, 1). It is a system of elections without power, or, more sharply, “participatory colonialism” (Smith 1974, ix–x). Some 224 years after the enactment of the D.C. Organic Act, D.C. residents continue to lack the full right to govern their own affairs.

D.C.’s Delegate to Congress: A Voice without a Vote

D.C. residents may vote every two years on a delegate to the House of Representatives, a “seat in the House of Representatives, with the right of debate, but not of voting” (Pub. L. 91-405, § 202 (a)). The delegate has had the right to serve on Congressional committees, to serve in party leadership, and to sponsor and cosponsor legislation. During certain Congresses, they may vote in Committee of the Whole, among other procedural rights. And yet, the delegate has always lacked the critical legislative function: voting on the final passage of legislation (Hudiburg 2022; J.A. Smith 2023, 403–6). Elected by those living outside the states, the delegates are charged to represent without a vote (Holtzman 1986; Lewallen and

Figure 2

Martin Luther King Jr., Walter Fauntroy, Dorothy Simms Fauntroy, Paul Moore Jr., Ralph David Abernathy, and Andrew Young (R to L) at the March for Home Rule, August 5, 1965

Source: Washington Star Photograph Collection, 061 (Washington, DC—Home Rule), DC Public Library, The People's Archive. <https://hdl.handle.net/1961/dcplislandora:117997>. Printed in the Evening Star, August 6, 1965, B1. Reprinted with permission of the DC Public Library, Star Collection, Washington Post.

Sparrow 2018; Mamet 2021; Mamet and Bussing 2024). On the range of roll call votes taken by the House—ranging from appropriations bills to impeachment, from authorizing of the use of military force to D.C. statehood, and even on federal tax rates for D.C. residents—the duly-elected D.C. delegate may not cast a vote. During votes on legislation, the delegate's name appears on the electronic voting board above the press gallery, but the space next to their name indicating which way they voted always appears blank.

D.C.'s delegate occupies a procedurally inferior status compared to the 435 voting, constitutional members of Congress in numerous other ways. Voting members may vote for Speaker; the delegate may not, nor may they vote to oust a sitting speaker.¹⁶ Voting members may vote to impeach; delegates may not.¹⁷ Voting members can sign discharge petitions to bring legislation directly to the floor, and their signature remains valid even if they resign or die in office. The delegate cannot sign discharge petitions. (On this dimension, a resigned or deceased member of Congress retains more procedural rights than a nonvoting delegate.) A chart of key differences appears in table 1. Overall, a side-by-side view illustrates the extent to which the delegates' parliamentary power is diminished compared to their 435 voting peers.

D.C.'s Absence in the Senate

D.C. residents lack any representation at all in the Senate, rendering them without a say in the ratification of treaties

Table 1
The delegate's second-class parliamentary powers

Parliamentary Right	Can It Be Exercised by a Member of Congress?	Can It Be Exercised by the D.C. Delegate to the House of Representatives?
Make regular parliamentary motions (e.g., the motion to lay on the table, the motion for previous question)	Yes	Yes
Sponsor and cosponsor legislation	Yes	Yes
Serve as impeachment manager	Yes	Yes
Sit on committees ^a	Yes	Yes
Sit on conference committees	Yes	Yes
Chair committees ^b	Yes	Yes
Vote in committee	Yes	Yes
Debate on the House floor	Yes	Yes
Vote on amendments in Committee of the Whole	Yes	Yes, but with an automatic revote if the delegates' votes are decisive ^c
Vote on final passage of legislation	Yes	No, pursuant to the U.S. Constitution (art. I, § 2, cl. 1) ^d
Vote for Speaker of the House	Yes	No, pursuant to the U.S. Constitution (art. I, § 2, cl. 5)
Vote to declare the office of Speaker vacant	Yes	No, pursuant to House practice ^e
Make a motion to reconsider	Yes	No, pursuant to House practice
Vote on impeachment	Yes	No, pursuant to House practice
Sign a discharge petition	Yes, and the signature remains valid even if a Member dies or resigns from office	No, pursuant to House practice

Notes:

^{a)} Delegate Stacey Plaskett (D-VI) served as a manager for the second Trump impeachment.

^{b)} However, no delegate in the modern era has been appointed to the Appropriations, Rules, or Budget Committees, and “party leaders typically assigned the delegates only to committees relevant to their local constituencies, and not to the power committees or other committees that grapple with broader national issues” (Lewallen and Sparrow 2018, 746).

^{c)} The last Delegate to chair a standing committee in Congress was William Henry Harrison in 1799 (Cama 2022).

^{d)} The D.C. Circuit affirmed this arrangement in Michel v. Anderson, 14 F.3d 623. A revote without the delegates has happened eight times—three times in the 103rd Congress, once in the 111th Congress, and four times in the 118th Congress (see also Hudiburg 2022, 2–3).

^{e)} Numerous close votes on the House floor might have had a different outcome were the nonvoting members able to vote. In the 19th Congress, for example, Indian Removal was nearly defeated by a substitute amendment, which garnered a tie vote, 98–98. If that substitute passed, the Trails of Tears may never have occurred (Remini 2006, 120; for other examples, see Mamet 2021, 409n42).

^{f)} The delegates could not vote on the failed resolution to oust Speaker Joseph Cannon on March 17, 1910, nor on the successful resolution to remove Speaker Kevin McCarthy on October 3, 2023.

(U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 2), impeachment trials (U.S. Const. art. I, § 3, cl. 6), and the confirmation of “Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officials of the United States” (U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 2). They are unable to provide “advice and consent” (U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 2) for the position of U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia (who prosecutes adult felony cases in D.C., an arrangement unlike any state) or on the confirmation of the federal judges, marshals, and other officials who preside in the District.¹⁸ Moreover, D.C. residents have no senator who can assist with routine casework. D.C. residents are also unable to request Congressionally directed spending (or earmarks) from the Senate, depriving D.C. in “tens to hundreds of millions of dollars” each year to nonprofits, public works projects, and government agencies (Norton 2022). Likewise, without senators, D.C. residents cannot work with a bicameral state delegation in Congress (Treul 2017). D.C. voters do periodically elect “Shadow Senators” and a “Shadow Representative,” whose duty is to lobby for D.C. statehood.¹⁹ These roles are unpaid, and come without any recognition in Congress. The shadow delegation watches debate from the public galleries along with tourists, interns, and Congressional staff.²⁰

Beyond these formal inequalities, the lack of a Senate seat has profound implications for the District’s say in the national policymaking process. Central to its logic is equal representation for the several states (see Madison’s Federalist No. 62, in Carey and McClellan 2001, 319–24).

The Senate's grand symbolism reminds us of that logic, including the ornate pediment on the Dirksen Senate Office Building, which reads, "THE SENATE IS THE LIVING SYMBOL OF OUR UNION OF STATES." Even though it is more populated than several states, even though its residents pay federal taxes and have served and died in every U.S. war, the residents of the federal district of Washington, D.C. are excluded from participation in the "Union of States." D.C.'s Senate absence is emblematic of its formally inferior role in the American constitutional schema.

The Demands of Democratic Equality

I have tried so far to sketch the myriad ways by which the United States falls short of ideals of democratic equality for the residents of its national capital. D.C. residents are taxed without representation, bound by coercive laws passed by lawmakers they did not elect, sent to war their elected legislators could not declare, prosecuted by unelected prosecutors, voteless in the House, voiceless in the Senate, and unable to fully manage their own local affairs without Congressional interference. This section fleshes out the democratic problems raised by this peculiar political status. It outlines a positive vision for an alternative arrangement, rooted in theories of democratic political equality, and considers the most persuasive objections.

Political theorists of various stripes have identified the centrality of political equality to democratic politics. For example, Niko Bowie argues that "what has historically distinguished democracy as a unique form of government is its pursuit of political equality" (2021, 167). There are several ways of conceptualizing what political equality entails. For theorists like Charles Beitz (1989) and James Lindley Wilson (2019, 75–95), political equality entails more than mere suffrage or equal formal political power. They argue for a capacious understanding of political equality, rooted, for instance, in a complex proceduralism or in the democratic deliberative process. While I am sympathetic to these views about the breadth of what political equality should require, on my account, the case of D.C. highlights how voting power should be seen as a necessary but insufficient condition for political equality.

Political equality should at a minimum, require equal voting power. That is, in a large representative democracy, consistent with notions of the equal political status of citizens, 1) one should be granted a vote for representatives in national and sub-national lawmaking bodies, 2) her vote should have equal weight to the votes of others, and 3) her elected representatives themselves should be empowered to have a vote on what the law is.

On all three domains, D.C. falls short of the requirements of equal voting power. First, for 1), the status of D.C. violates political equality because D.C. residents cannot vote for senators or for voting representatives, lawmakers who, under the plenary power granted Congress over D.C. in the constitution, make both federal and local law for D.C. residents. For 2), under the Twenty-third Amendment, D.C. residents only have equal weight in voting for president as residents of the least populous state, which has, at times, led to D.C. having fewer electoral votes than it would have had were it a state. For 3), laws passed by D.C.'s locally elected officials can be nullified by unelected, unaccountable members of Congress. D.C.'s locally elected officials are therefore not empowered to have a binding vote on what local law is. Likewise, D.C.'s delegate to Congress may debate but not vote; D.C.'s sole federal elected official is thus also not fully empowered to have a final passage vote on what the law is.

A few caveats. First, note here that my concern is limited to voting power. There are other violations of democratic political equality not related to voting such as standing for office (e.g., someone in Maryland or Virginia is able to run for governor or senator while a D.C. resident may not). Second, the standards of equal voting power are capacious. Taking ideals of democratic equality seriously might require rethinking the structure of the Senate altogether, where roughly the 578,000 citizens of Wyoming have equal voting power with some 39.24 million citizens of California, and rethinking the unrepresentative structure of the electoral college.²¹ Were D.C. to become a state, D.C. voters would have greater voting power for Senate than all but the smallest states. For the purposes of my argument, we might say that the standards by which democratic equality should apply to D.C. are a non-ideal requirement of decreasing power inequality. Allowing D.C. residents to vote for two Senators, even if the votes of D.C. residents will have disproportionate weight compared to voters in California, is far preferable to disfranchising D.C. residents whole cloth.

It is worth pausing here to consider objections of the form that D.C.'s political inequality is justified, or at least tolerable. Four objections are considered. First, one objection would surmise that even if D.C. is formally politically unequal, efforts to enfranchise D.C. residents or grant the District equal political standing are in fact a partisan power grab by Democrats to gain extra votes in Congress (McLaughlin 2020). The equal voting power argument suggests that what matters is not, at base, the given partisan political valence of D.C. statehood, but instead the more basic need to have an equal say in collective self-government. Judith Shklar's analysis of equality in American political thought is useful here. According to Shklar (1991, 56), "the deepest impulse for demanding the suffrage arises from the recognition that it is the characteristic, the identifying, feature of democratic citizenship in America, not a means to other ends." Political equality for D.C. would be desirable even if it didn't lead to Democratic electoral gains.

A second, more persuasive objection states that D.C. residents seeking full representation and equal political standing can easily move to nearby jurisdictions like Maryland or Northern Virginia, thereby becoming enfranchised and gaining the privileges coming with living in a U.S. state. As Chip Roy (R-TX) once put it: “They could vote with their feet. They could move into Maryland. They could move to Virginia. They could be in another location. That is fine.”²² Indeed, compared to persons moving around the world to escape repressive regimes and gain freedom, the cost of moving across the river (or even across the street) from D.C. to its neighboring jurisdictions may seem small.

There are several possible responses to this “foot voting” objection. For one, moving costs are higher than might first appear. There are indirect costs beyond the cost of physically moving, such as “the cost of parting with employment opportunities, family members who stay behind, and social networks” (Somin 2020, 49). But indirect costs seem hard to quantify and harder still to generalize. A second, more persuasive response is one of fairness. For D.C. residents who already are treated as democratic unequals, persons who pay income tax without voting representation and who lack full local self-government, it seems like a disproportionate burden to need to move to gain democratic equality. The costs of this move will be unfairly wrought by those already treated as second-class citizens. But above all, the “foot voting” objection obfuscates all those people who cannot move and will remain. The diminished political status of D.C. residents will persist so long as there are any people living in the District.

Third, some have argued that D.C. has more than adequate virtual representation in Congress. Rep. Benjamin Hardin (KY) asserted in 1835 that “the people here [in D.C.] have more weight in this House than the representatives of any State in the Union. The members of Congress associate with them, partake of their hospitalities, and lend a kind ear to their importunities.”²³ Frederick Douglass also gestured toward this objection in an 1877 address:

There has of late been much complaint of this discrimination against the people of the District. But the injustice is, as was foreseen by the fathers of the Republic, more seeming than real ... What they have lost by their exclusion from the ballot box is more than made up to them by their contact with the men who make the laws and administer the Government. Legislators, judges, and executive officers naturally enough desire to stand well with their neighbors, and they are seldom so inflexible as not to yield something to accomplish this result. (Douglass 1991 [1877], 457)

A century later, Senator Orrin Hatch made a similar argument:

The problems, needs, and concerns of the District, unlike those of Wichita or Dubuque, inevitably come to the attention of nearly all members of Congress through District radio, television, and newspapers ... The typical letter-to-the-editor read by Senator Smith on Sunday morning is far more likely to be from a GS-15 bureaucrat at the Department of Energy than from a pharmacist in Laramie, Wyoming. (Hatch 1978, 521)

This objection confuses proximity for accountability. No matter how close D.C. residents may live to the Capitol, no matter how much contact they have with lawmakers, those lawmakers seek re-election not by D.C. residents but by voters in their district. It is not D.C. residents who can hold lawmakers from Kentucky or Maine accountable for their actions on D.C. policy issues, but rather the voters of those states.²⁴

Fourth, some point to the desires of the Founders to have an independent federal district, “separate from, and not dependent on, any State” (Baker 2015). Under this objection, the federal nature of the U.S. system requires a capital city that is under plenary federal control. It requires, in other words, a city that is for all the nation—and a city governed collectively by the nation. There is indeed a unique federal interest in D.C. affairs. That federal interest that would be retained under D.C. statehood with the creation of a small federal enclave consisting of the National Mall, White House, Capitol Building, Supreme Court, and adjacent federal office buildings.²⁵ The federal government would retain plenary authority over that federal area. Yet outside this enclave, in the city of Washington beyond the marble and monumental, the federal interest would give way to the democratic interest of local self-government. D.C. statehood would mean that neighborhood parks would be managed by a local parks department, not the National Park Service; local crimes would be prosecuted by a locally elected attorney general, not an unelected U.S. Attorney; zoning decisions would be determined by the local community, not a federal board with limited D.C. representation. The argument, in other words, concedes that there is an important federal interest in the governance of D.C., but contends that federal interest should be limited to a federal area. Maintaining a federal interest need not yield a permanently disenfranchised class of Americans.

One way to view the cause of D.C. statehood is through the long sweep of democratic changes to the U.S. constitution. The quest for democratic equality for D.C. residents echoes the country’s gradual expansion of suffrage through the Fifteenth, Seventeenth, Nineteenth, Twenty-third, Twenty-fourth, and Twenty-sixth Amendments, the Voting Rights Act of 1965, and in various constitutional evolutions which supported equal voting power. The expansion of suffrage has of course fallen short in crucial ways (Keyssar 2000; Dilts 2014; Weare 2017; Hasen 2024). But this history also suggests that within the American political tradition exists a powerful case for democratic equality—an idea that we all deserve equal voting power to shape our democratic future. D.C. statehood would contribute to that vision of the American polity. As W.E.B. Du Bois once wrote, “if America is ever to become a democracy built on the broadest justice to every citizen, then every citizen must be enfranchised” (2007 [1920], 71).

Achieving Democratic Equality

From the perspective of equal voting power, statehood remains the best strategy to achieve political equality for the people of Washington. It would grant D.C. residents voting members of the House and Senate, who would have equal voting power in national decisions, and elected local officials whose votes on local laws would be binding, absent interference by unelected lawmakers from elsewhere. It would be irrevocable, unlike statutory schema for limited self-government or nonvoting representation in Congress (Smith 1974, 270–74). It would grant D.C. “equal footing” with the several existing states under the Admissions Clause (U.S. Const. art. IV, § 3, cl. 1; see also Hanna 1951, 522–24; Barnes 2010, 4). It thereby complies with a minimum requirement for political equality.

Advocacy for D.C. statehood dates at least to 1893, when labor leader A.E. Redstone formed a Home Rule Committee to call for a state of “Columbia” (Musgrove 2017, 5). It persisted in the radical activism of statehood advocates like Julius Hobson and Josephine Butler, who succeeded in pushing a onetime fringe issue into the mainstream (Smith 1974, 256–65; Asch and Musgrove 2017, 378; Pearlman 2019, 195; Kumfer 2024). Yet the struggle for statehood has been arduous for the people of D.C. As Derek Musgrove notes, “statehood activists have consistently failed to advance the cause” (2017, 4). At turn after turn, the quest for statehood has been stymied by an obstinate Congress, by partisan political calculations, and by disinterested elected officials.²⁶ Opponents have argued that it would give federal employees and advocates of “big government” too much power.²⁷ Statehood has been long stymied by racial animus and anti-Black racial attitudes (Nteta et al. 2023; Horne 2023, 510).²⁸ D.C. residents voted 86% for statehood in 2016. In Congress, a statehood admission bill passed the House in 2020 and 2021. But the uphill battle remains, and the obstacles are large. Robinson Woodward-Burns (2021) writes that “the history of the D.C. statehood movement has been one of incremental gains against entrenched congressional opponents and constitutional constraints.” In its absence, other options remain for reducing the political inequality Washingtonians face with their fellow citizens.

Figure 3
Members of Self Determination for D.C. dump tea crates into the Potomac River, 1973

Source: Washington Star Photograph Collection, 061 (Demonstrations - Home Rule - Oversized), DC Public Library, The People's Archive, <http://hdl.handle.net/1961/dcplislandora:118008>. Printed in the Evening Star, August 16, 1973, D3. Reprinted with permission of the DC Public Library, Star Collection, Washington Post.

One option is retrocession. Retrocession would cede D.C. (except a “federal district” consisting of the Capitol down to the White House) to the state of Maryland. Retrocession is an old idea, proposed as early as February 8, 1803, by John Bacon of Massachusetts.²⁹ Upon introduction, John Smilie of Pennsylvania endorsed the idea, saying that “under our exercise of exclusive jurisdiction the citizens here are deprived of all political rights ... if Congress can derive no solid benefit from the exercise of this power, why keep the people in this degraded situation?”³⁰ But after much debate, the retrocession resolution was defeated in the House by a vote of 26–66.³¹

Amid the push for D.C. statehood in the last three decades, retrocession has been a popular approach especially favored by Congressional Republicans.³² It was considered on the floor of the Senate in 2009, and defeated 30–67.³³ On its face, retrocession would solve many injustices afforded D.C. residents: it would give them voting representation in the House and Senate and full local self-government, granting them equality among people of the several states. While it may advance certain forms of democratic equality, retrocession would violate the express wishes of D.C. residents (86% of whom voted for statehood in a 2016 referendum) and Maryland residents (who are overwhelmingly opposed to retrocession in public opinion polls; see McCartney and Clement 2019). Elected officials in both jurisdictions also strongly oppose retrocession, and neither jurisdiction would assent to D.C.’s retrocession to Maryland.³⁴ Put otherwise, retrocession may indeed increase the democratic rights of D.C. residents—but it would do so in an undemocratic way.

In the absence of statehood or of retrocession, other suboptimal options exist to mitigate the democratic inequality afforded D.C. In terms of D.C. local affairs, Congress could amend the Home Rule Act to grant D.C. full local self-government, unlike the partial self-government it enjoys today. Congress could remove the Congressional review period for D.C. legislation.³⁵ It could provide D.C. the power to legislate on any matter not preempted by federal law (Hanson and Wolman 2023, 295). It could allow D.C. residents to choose the size and structure of its Council. It could allow D.C., not the president, to select its own local judges. While numerous changes to home rule would enhance D.C.’s autonomy, however, they all leave the District in an unequal status. As representatives of the D.C. Statehood Party argued in 1973, “so long as Congress retains some kind of veto ... there can be no real home rule. Elected district government officials would fear to take actions which antagonize the Congress, and therefore regardless of many times Congress actually exercises a veto, they will in effect have pre-vetoed much legislation.”³⁶ Home rule without statehood still renders D.C. residents democratically unequal compared to the citizens of the several states.

In the House, rules changes could enhance the procedural power of the delegate. To return to table 1, this would entail granting the D.C. delegate procedural powers currently prohibited by House practice. For example, the delegate could be granted the right to sign a discharge petition. The discharge petition is a device by which a majority of House members may bypass the committee of referral to bring a measure directly to the House floor. Currently, delegates may vote to report a measure from a committee, and they may vote to amend a measure in the Committee of the Whole, but they may not sign a petition to discharge a measure from a committee. Allowing the delegate to sign discharge petitions would put the discharge rules into accordance with earlier rules changes that allow the delegate to vote to report measures out of committee (Hudiburg 2022, 8–9).

The delegate could also be granted a vote on impeachment.³⁷ Although impeachment is a rarely used tool, it remains inconsistent that D.C. residents may vote for president (under the Twenty-third Amendment) but that their elected representative in Congress may not vote to impeach the president (U.S. Const. art. I, § 2, cl. 5). Without an impeachment vote for the D.C. delegate, D.C. residents become “the functional equivalent of partial citizens—good enough to vote for president, but not good enough to decide whether to remove him.”³⁸ The Twenty-third Amendment’s Enforcement Clause (“Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation”) provides constitutional support for granting the D.C. delegate in particular the right to vote on impeachment.³⁹

The delegate could also vote on a resolution declaring the Office of the Speaker vacant. The Constitution says that “the House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen every second Year by the People of the several States” and that “the House of Representatives shall chuse their Speaker,” (U.S. Const. art. I, § 2, cl. 1 and 5). Left unsaid is who retains the power to oust the speaker, and there is no apparent constitutional bar to allowing the delegate from D.C. a vote on that motion. As the Office of Speaker sat vacant for a week in January and later three weeks in fall 2023, some 700,000 residents of the District of Columbia had no floor vote about who that speaker would be, which had practical consequences for D.C.’s local governance.⁴⁰

There are other, more routine motions, too, on which the delegate could be permitted to vote, such as the motion to reconsider, a procedural device which allows the House to review its actions on a given proposal. Delegates could be permitted to vote on House rules or other simple resolutions, which are not law and only express the collective sentiment of the House (e.g., legislation entitled H.Res.). The Constitution offers no prohibition of these procedural expansions of the delegate's power. Even though these reforms fall short of equal voting power (which can only come from statehood), they would nonetheless enhance the procedural rights of the delegate, and hence expand the formal powers afforded to D.C.'s elected delegate.⁴¹

In the Senate, short of statehood, another option to reduce (but not eliminate) D.C.'s disenfranchisement is to award it a nonvoting Senate delegate position. While the nonvoting delegate to the House has a long history, dating to a committee chaired by Jefferson in the late eighteenth century, never has a nonstate entity or territory been awarded a Senate seat. The dreams of Washingtonians for a senator have been longstanding. Late in life, Frederick Douglass, who ran to be D.C.'s first nonvoting delegate to Congress, was reminded that while enslaved, he had hoped to be the first Black member of the Senate (Muller 2012, 43–44). Nearly a century later, the House passed a D.C. Home Rule Act that included a provision awarding D.C. a nonvoting Senate seat. Wrote Senator Edward Kennedy (D-MA) in a letter to Senator Eagleton, "the designation of a nonvoting delegate to the Senate from the District of Columbia, offers the promise of providing an effective 'in-house' lobby toward the ultimate goal of full congressional representation in the Congress for the people of Washington. The non-voting Senate delegate is an appealing provision that I believe deserves to be maintained."⁴² Other advocates also supported the Senate delegate provision. Sterling Tucker and Richard W. Clark of the Self-Determination for D.C. Coalition wrote that "we strongly endorse the House bill's provision for a non-voting D.C. delegate to the Senate."⁴³ And yet, in conference committee with the Senate, the provision was dropped from the bill.⁴⁴ According to staffer Nelson Rimensnyder:

At the opening of the House-Senate conference on the Home Rule Act, Senator Tom Eagleton (D-MO), Chairman of the Senate D.C. Committee, declared that the provision for a Senate delegate was not even on the table for discussion.

Shortly after the conclusion of the conference, I asked Senator Eagleton if he would consider holding hearings on the concept of a D.C. Senate delegate. His answer was an emphatic "No!" However, Senator Charles Mathias (R-MD), ranking Republican on the D.C. Committee at the time, told me he thought the Senate delegate idea was worthy of consideration by the Senate.⁴⁵

It still is. A nonvoting D.C. Senate delegate position would provide a modicum of voice from the nation's capital to the Senate chamber. Even without a floor vote, that person could provide input on committees with jurisdiction over D.C. and on policy issues relevant to its citizens, request appropriations, and debate other Senate business, including executive and judicial nominations.

Short of statehood, changes to enhance D.C. home rule and strengthen congressional representation for District residents could enhance D.C.'s democratic standing, but one downside to these changes is that they could be rolled back at any time by Congress—just like in 1801 (when Congress ended congressional representation for D.C. residents) and in 1874 (when Congress revoked territorial government and the nonvoting delegate from D.C.) and in 1995 and 2011 (when the House removed the ability for the D.C. delegate to vote in the Committee of the Whole) (Hudiburg 2022, 2). Other options surely remain, too, each with merits and drawbacks. While it is worth considering inferior mechanisms which reduce D.C.'s political inequality and grant it greater standing in local and national governance, statehood ought to remain the only democratically acceptable political outcome. A grant of statehood is irrevocable; anything short of statehood is subject to the whims of Congress exercising its plenary power over the District.

Conclusion: "The Most Un-American Place in America"⁴⁶

I have tried here to defend the claim that equal standing as fellow citizens is incongruent with nonvoting congressional representation and curtailed local self-government. District residents are doubly disenfranchised. In Congress, they lack any representation in the Senate and their nonvoting delegate to the House has a procedurally diminished standing compared to the Representatives from the states. Locally, D.C. laws can be nullified by members of Congress who D.C. residents did not elect. Throughout D.C. history, racial animus and anti-Black racism have been at the core of its second-class political status (Asch and Musgrove 2017). The residents of the District of Columbia, though guaranteed a bundle of constitutional rights accorded other citizens, are denied the wellspring of those rights—the vote.

D.C.'s democratic problem gestures toward a broader research agenda needed in political science about the state-centered boundaries of U.S. politics, a research agenda to study the profound inequality between states and non-states in American democratic life. This conflict has struck at themes of equality so important to American democratic ideals. William Riker (1964, 9) has written that "federalism is the main alternative to empire as a technique of aggregating large areas under one government," but a study of the democratic politics in D.C. shows how institutions of federalism and empire are more coterminous than they might at first appear. The endurance of disenfranchised, sub-state anomalous zones like Washington, D.C., Puerto Rico, Guam, American Samoa, the Northern Mariana Islands, and the U.S. Virgin Islands, places overwhelmingly home to racial and ethnic minorities who are bound by coercive, federal law on which their elected representatives may not vote, strains notions of political equality central to the American democratic ideal (Neuman 1996; Immerwahr 2019; Maass 2020). Their endurance shows how, long after the passage of the Reconstruction Amendments, full citizenship in the United States is still tied to statehood (Bulman-Pozen and Johnson 2022; more broadly, see Erman 2018; Henning 2023). These places represent a “break in the democratic fabric,” and it is right to call their political status paradigmatic for evaluating whether the American polity lives up to its own democratic creed (Raskin 1999, 41).

Hope for D.C., at least, is not lost. Statehood bills passed the House for the first time ever in 2020 and 2021. And were Douglass Commonwealth to become a state, its empowerment could spur a broader movement for democratic equality for those living outside the states, as well. As Raskin once wrote (2014, 54), “a serious struggle for political equality in the District offers the most dramatic possibility for a democratic breakthrough not just for Washingtonians but for millions of other disenfranchised citizens in the fifty states and the territories and for all Americans, whose voting rights have proven to be precarious indeed.” Democratic equality demands, at a minimum, equal voting power across subnational domains. It behooves a country committed to ideals of self-governance and of democratic equality to extend those principles to the residents of its capital city and beyond.

Acknowledgments

The author thanks Charles Beitz, Lucy Britt, Austin Bussing, Kai Yui Samuel Chan, Ingrid Creppell, Prithviraj Datta, Jihyun Jeong, Quinn Lester, Charles Nathan, Alex Noronha, Jerome Paige, Nathan Pippenger, Lucia Rafanelli, Loren Reinoso, Joseph Rodriguez, Volker Schmitz, Douglas Thompson, Robinson Woodward-Burns, anonymous reviewers, and audiences at the Association for Political Theory, George Washington University Political Theory Workshop, DC History Conference, and Midwest Political Science Association for comments and suggestions. Special thanks to the APSA Congressional Fellowship Program and to APSA staff members Meghan McConaughy and Nathan Bader. Research support was provided by the APSA Centennial Center’s William A. Steiger Fund for Legislative Studies.

Notes

- 1 The revised code standardized and modernized penalties for D.C. crimes, updating extreme sentences imposed in the tough-on-crime era. It was the product of sixteen years of work among nonpartisan staff, local prosecutors, defense attorneys, and judges, and it passed the D.C. Council 13–0, was vetoed by Mayor Muriel Bowser, and then passed the Council again 12–1. Congressional Republicans, joined by President

- Biden, were concerned that the revised code lowered penalties for carjacking amid a spike in crime in D.C. (Samuels 2023; Lewallen 2024, 18n1).
- 2 McCarthy emphasized the significance of the event: “We are making history What today really means is we’re sending a message to every city, every county, every state that no longer will Washington be soft on crime. No longer are we defunding the police. No longer are we softening sentences” (Flynn and Silverman 2023).
- 3 U.S. Const. art. 1, § 8, Cl. 17. For James Wilson, power over the district was also conferred to the executive: “With respect likewise to the particular district of ten miles . . . there the legislative power will be exclusively lodged in the president, senate, and house of representatives of the United States” ([1993, 64]. Note that “ten Miles square” has been in practice interpreted to mean 100 square miles (Elliot 1830, 9; Schwartz 2022, 4n21).
- 4 12 Annals of Congress 488, February 8, 1803.
- 5 See Noyes (1917, 70–72; 1951, 82–83). Rep. John Dennis of Maryland appears to have been the first to suggest a nonvoting delegate for D.C. 10 Annals of Congress 998–9, February 2, 1801 (see also Raven-Hansen 1975, 174–79).
- 6 Chipman, Norton P., “Relations of the District of Columbia to the General Government: Is Washington City the Capital of the United States, or the Capital of the District of Columbia? The Duty of the Nation toward its Capital,” Speech to the U.S. House of Representatives, Washington: Government Printing Office (February 28, 1874). D.C. Public Library Special Collections, Artificial and Ephemeral Collection (Collection 60), Box 21, Folder 16, 30.
- 7 Chipman, Norton P., “The District of Columbia,” Speech to the U.S. House of Representatives, Washington: F. & J. Roves & Geo A. Bailey (June 3, 1872). In the Washingtoniana Collection, Gelman Library Special Collections, George Washington University: F 198.C542. Chipman was favored by Black Washingtonians, who made up 38% of registered electorate for the 1871 election (Ingle 1893, 69; Harrison 2011, 188).
- 8 Douglass ran for D.C. delegate in 1871, and, after losing the Republican nomination to Norton P. Chipman, served for two months in 1871 as an appointee of President Grant on the territorial council of the District of Columbia (Masur 2010, 217; Muller 2012, 37–46; Blight 2018, 588). During his term on the D.C. territorial council, Douglass introduced bills on school equality and on fair treatment for Black artisans, and sat on the committees on National Relations, Railroads and Canals, Markets, Printing, and Rules (Piper 1944, 107–8). Six years later, he delivered a famous speech, “Our National Capital,” which conveyed the promise of political equality in D.C. “Under the majestic dome of the American Capitol, as truly as under the broad blue sky of heaven, men of all races, colors, and conditions may now stand in equal freedom, thrilled with the sentiment of equal citizenship and common country,” Douglass said (1991 [1877], 451; see also Culbertson 2014, 932).

- 9 The state-territory distinction dates to the Northwest Ordinance, which laid out the process for transition from territory to state. That process was not always followed—and was driven by sectional, partisan, and above all racial considerations (Story 1873; Jefferson 1952 [1784]; Duffey 1995; Frymer 2017; 2020).
- 10 Some states, like Utah, Arizona, and New Mexico, were long denied statehood on racial or religious grounds, while other states were quickly granted statehood by Congress, often for partisan reasons (Stewart and Weingast 1992; McCarty, Poole, and Rosenthal 2002; Frymer 2017; Maass 2020).
- 11 John Lindsay (R-NY) foresaw that the provision would “impose, by constitutional language, a permanent inferior status upon the District’s participation in the electoral college.” Congressional Record, June 14, 1960, 12563.
- 12 Alabama was later to ratify the Twenty-third Amendment in 2002.
- 13 For examples of these exceptions, “power to intervene in Puerto Rican government is not restricted by the consent of Puerto Ricans—the United States may restructure the government unilaterally and without notice” such as the imposition of a financial oversight board in 2014 (Blackhawk 2023, 70–71; see also López-Santana 2023).
- 14 P.L. 93–198, § 601. Other compromises gave the president, not D.C. mayor, the power to appoint local judges, mandated the partisan composition of the D.C. Council, and restricted D.C. control over its budget (Smith 1974, 165–67; Fauntroy 2003, 55–57; Pearlman 2019, 200).
- 15 Bill Summary, Fiscal Year 2024 Financial Services and General Government Appropriations Bill. House Committee on Appropriations, June 21, 2023 (<https://appropriations.house.gov/sites/republicans.appropriations.house.gov/files/documents/FY24%20Financial%20Services%20and%20General%20Government%20-%20Bill%20Summary.pdf#page=6>) [<https://perma.cc/W7NP-MWDE>]. Most of these riders were not included in the final, enacted FY24 appropriations bill.
- 16 Congressional Record, January 3, 2025, H4.
- 17 Congressional Record, December 18, 1998, H11771–H11773.
- 18 In procedural terms, D.C.’s lack of representation in the Senate is especially severe during executive business, where Senators advise and consent to nominations and ratify treaties (Gold 2018, 169–84).

- 19 “A Representative or Senator ... shall inform the Congress and individual members of Congress that the District of Columbia residents meet the standards traditionally required by Congress for the admission of a United States territory as a state of the United States.” D.C. Code §1-123 (f)(1-3); see also Smith 1974, 283; Hendriks and Reid 2024, 688.
- 20 “[Q:] Do you go in when the other senators are voting? [A:] We’re not allowed on the floor of the Senate. They’ll make a special accommodation for us to sit in the gallery. I could take you to lunch, maybe, at the Senate dining room. There are certain courtesies I get” (Manteuffel 2018).
- 21 One alternative has been offered by Douglas I. Thompson who has suggested a “Regional Senate” structure, based on the principles of one person, one vote, and where “there would no longer be any need for independent states within the national system of political representation” (Thompson 2019, 255; see also Wirls 2021, 38–83, 205–10). Other changes like a National Popular Vote Interstate Compact would help to realize equal voting power in the selection of the president.
- 22 “H.R. 51: Making D.C. the 51st State,” Hearing before the House Committee on Oversight and Reform, September 19, 2019, Serial No. 116–62, 48. For defenses of foot voting, see Charles M. Tiebout (1956) and Ilya Somin (2020, 91–120).
- 23 Register of Debates, 23rd Congress, Vol. 11, No. 2., February 4, 1835, 1189, see also Keeley (1939, 80). Similarly, Rep. Joel Sutherland (R-PA) remarked that “he considered himself a representative of the people of the District of Columbia, and also the Representative of the people of the first congressional district of Pennsylvania.” See Congressional Globe, 23rd Congress, Vol. 1, February 4, 1835, 199.
- 24 As one Washingtonian wrote in the early 1800s, “every member takes care of his constituents, but we are the constituents of no one” (quoted by Smith 1974, 44).
- 25 H.R. 51, 118th Congress, Washington, D.C. Admission Act, § 112 (a).
- 26 Senator Charles Matthias (R-MD) once put it this way: “As a Senator from Maryland, I have found this problem to be even more acute. Let me repeat what I have said before: If there is a problem affecting the District of Columbia and another problem which arises at the same time affecting the State of Maryland and I am asked to choose where I will devote my time and attention, I must say that it is going to be on the affairs of the State of Maryland and not on the affairs of the District of Columbia.” Congressional Record, December 19, 1973, 42452.

- 27 As Senator William L. Scott (R-VA) wrote in his constituent newsletter, "If full representation in the Congress were granted the city, it would insure [sic] the election of senators sympathetic to the needs and concerns of big government, who would promote the welfare of government agencies and employees. Senators from the District would be under no compulsion to consider the needs of any competing interest, such as farmers, miners, manufacturers, or many of the divisions of labor and management located within the fifty states." Senator William L. Scott (VA), "Your Senator Bill Scott Reports," August 1978, 1. Lawton Chiles Senate Collection, MSS 0328. Special and Area Studies Collections, George A. Smathers Libraries, University of Florida. Box 200, Folder 61: Constitutional Amendment District of Columbia, 1978.

Senator Orrin Hatch (R-UT) was also opposed. "In effect," he argued in a Dear Colleague letter, "the American people would be asked to give a special interest group, Federal employees, living in a city with a shrinking population, its own Senators and Congressmen. I don't believe they will accept this." Letter of May 2, 1978, 2. Lawton Chiles Senate Collection, MSS 0328. Special and Area Studies Collections, George A. Smathers Libraries, University of Florida. Box 200, Folder 61: Constitutional Amendment District of Columbia, 1978.
- 28 The history of explicit, intentional racial discrimination is normatively relevant to D.C.'s political status in a few ways. First, the fact of historical injustice toward Black Washingtonians provides an affirmative reason for repairing some of that injustice through full enfranchisement. D.C. statehood would be a form of repair for the decades of racial harm accorded to Black D.C. residents. Second, D.C. could become the first majority-minority state in a way that enhances American federalism. As Bulman-Pozen and Johnson write, "Statehood for D.C. offers an opportunity to realize minority rule as an aspect of American federalism More than a century after Reconstruction held out the fleeting promise of majority Black state governments, D.C. statehood could resurrect multi-racial federalism for the twenty-first century" (Bulman-Pozen and Johnson 2022, 1320). Jesse Jackson once made a similar argument. D.C. statehood, he said, "may be the only way to integrate the U.S. Senate" (quoted. by Musgrove 2017, 10). As a plurality Black state, D.C. would offer a distinct model of governance which would improve descriptive and substantive representation.
- 29 12 Annals of Congress 487, February 8, 1803 (see also Richards 2004).
- 30 Ibid., 487.
- 31 Ibid., 506-507.
- 32 See, e.g., H.R. 4195, 101st Congress; H.R. 1204, 102nd Congress; H.R. 1205, 103rd Congress; H.R. 1028, 104th Congress; H.R. 831, 105th Congress; H.R. 558, 106th Congress; H.R. 810, 107th Congress; H.R. 381, 108th Congress; H.R. 1858, 110th Congress; H.R. 1015, 111th Congress; H.R. 3732, 112th Congress; H.R. 2681, 113th Congress; H.R. 8517, 116th Congress; H.R. 8539, 116th Congress; H.R. 472, 117th Congress; H.R. 2614, 117th Congress; H.R. 2651, 117th Congress; S. 1361, 117th Congress; H.R. 980, 118th Congress. See Jamin Raskin (2014, 62n82): "If everything else fails to achieve democratic equality, there are profound historical, cultural, political, demographic, environmental, and economic ties between Maryland and the District that could make a reunified state a desirable and compelling second-best solution from the perspective of people on both sides of the borderline." But more recently, Raskin has dubbed retrocession "an irrelevant distraction when the people of Washington have already written a state constitution and petitioned to join the union as their own state" (McCartney 2021).
- 33 S.Amdt.585, 111th Congress.
- 34 Under historical precedent, the assent of the people has been needed for D.C. retrocession. When parts of the District of Columbia (in Alexandria) were retroceded to the Commonwealth of Virginia in 1846, Congress made the retrocession to be contingent on "the assent of the people of the county and town of Alexandria" (quoted. by Schwartz 2022, 4). Strong opposition among both residents and elected officials today means that similar assent of the people for retrocession into Maryland would be very unlikely. In terms of democratic theory, retrocession would violate the "all-affected principle", i.e., that those affected by a collective decision be included in the making of that decision.
- 35 See H.R. 268, 118th Congress, District of Columbia Legislative Home Rule Act.
- 36 Memo re: Conversation with 4 representatives of the D.C. Statehood Party on Home Rule and Statehood, March 6, 1972. In the National Archives, Washington, D.C., RG 233, Records of the U.S. House of Representatives, 93rd Congress, Committee on the District of Columbia, Box 22 - Legislative Files, H.R. 9056, H.R. 9598, H.R. 9617, Home Rule Documents Pre-1973, Incl. Hoover.
- 37 Under current practice, delegates are in an odd position where they can strategize, make arguments, and present evidence of impeachment—yet cannot vote to impeach. As one headline put it, "Stacey Plaskett, a House delegate who couldn't vote to impeach Trump, is using her prosecutorial background to try to convict him" (Itkowitz 2021).
- 38 Eleanor Holmes Norton, Congressional Record, December 18, 1998, H11771-H11773, H11867.

- 39 This argument was raised in a privileged resolution offered by Norton during the Clinton impeachment. Congressional Record, December 18, 1998, H11771-3. She also raised this argument during the first Trump impeachment. “The 23rd Amendment of our Constitution gave D.C. residents the right to vote for President and Vice President. It should follow, as day follows night, that D.C. residents should have the vote to remove the President, as well.” Congressional Record, December 17, 2019, H10604.
- 40 The prolonged Speaker fight delayed the transmission of D.C. law to Congress for the designated review period, and in turn delayed the enactment of D.C. law—further curtailing D.C.’s local self-government (Austermuhle 2023).
- 41 Another proposal would grant the D.C. delegate a vote on any matter exclusively concerning the District of Columbia (Cheh 2019; Bouker 2020, 133). This proposal was considered by the D.C. Council in 2017 and 2019 but was never enacted.
- 42 October 11, 1973. In the National Archives, Washington, D.C., RG 46, Records of the U.S. Senate, 93rd Congress, Governmental Affairs Committee, Subcommittee on the District of Columbia, Box 9, Folder Home Rule, General Corres.
- 43 Letter from Tucker and Clark to Eagleton, October 26, 1973. In the National Archives, Washington, D.C., RG 46, Records of the U.S. Senate, 93rd Congress, Governmental Affairs Committee, Subcommittee on the District of Columbia, Box 9, Folder Home Rule, General Corres.
- 44 Committee records show the D.C. Senate delegate question as the final consideration on the conference agenda, but the question seems to have been resolved early in the months-long negotiations between House and Senate conferees. See “Conference Agenda Comparing S.1435 with the House Amendment thereto,” October 30, 1973 and “Agenda,” Pre-November 15. In the National Archives, Washington, D.C., RG 233, Records of the U.S. House of Representatives, 93rd Congress, Committee on the District of Columbia, Box 21: Legislative Files, H.R. 9056
- 45 Rimensyder, Nelson, “A Delegate Voice in the Senate for the District of Columbia,” in Common Sense Justice for the Nation’s Capital: An Examination of Proposals to Give D.C. Residents Direct Representation, Hearing before the House Committee on Government Reform, 108th Congress, June 24, 2004, Serial No. 108-218, 149-150.
- 46 This is a formulation of longtime D.C. journalist Tom Sherwood (quoted. in Brown 2023).

References

Asch, Chris Myers, and George Derek Musgrove. 2017. Chocolate City: A History of Race and Democracy in the

- Nation’s Capital*. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.
- Austermuhle, Martin. 2023. “Speaker of the House Drama Impacting Fate of DC Laws.” DCist, January 5. (<https://dcist.com/story/23/01/05/dc-laws-congress-speaker-house/>) [<https://perma.cc/G7XN-5395>].
- Baker, John S. 2015. “Interpretation: The Twenty-Third Amendment.” National Constitution Center (<https://constitutioncenter.org/the-constitution/amendments/amendment-xxiii/interpretations/155>) [<https://perma.cc/L24F-RRET>].
- Barnes, Johnny. 2010. “Towards Equal Footing: Responding to the Perceived Constitutional, Legal and Practical Impediments to Statehood for the District of Columbia.” University of the District of Columbia Law Review 13(1): 1–70.
- Beitz, Charles R. 1989. Political Equality: An Essay in Democratic Theory. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Blackhawk, Maggie. 2023. “The Constitution of American Colonialism.” Harvard Law Review 137(1): 1–152.
- Blight, David W. 2018. Frederick Douglass: Prophet of Freedom. New York: Simon & Schuster.
- Bouker, Jon S. 2020. “Remarks: ‘When They Go Low, We Go Local’ Strategies for Pursuing DC Democracy in the Age of Trump.” University of the District of Columbia Law Review 21(2): 130–37.
- Bowie, Nikolas. 2021. “Antidemocracy.” Harvard Law Review 135(1): 160–219.
- Bowling, Kenneth R. 1977. “New Light on the Philadelphia Mutiny of 1783: Federal-State Confrontation at the Close of the War for Independence.” Pennsylvania Magazine of History and Biography 101(4): 419–50.
- Brown, Emma. 2023. “‘Dream City’ Connects D.C. Students to City History.” Washington Post, January 22.
- Bulman-Pozen, Jessica, and Olatunde C.A. Johnson. 2022. “Federalism and Equal Citizenship: The Constitutional Case for DC Statehood.” Georgetown Law Journal 110(6): 1269–324.
- Cama, Timothy. 2022. “Democrats Prepare to Battle for Top Committee Spots.” POLITICO E&E News, December 13. (<https://www.eenews.net/articles/democrats-prepare-to-battle-for-top-committee-spots/>) [<https://perma.cc/5FN5-3C69>].
- Campbell, Natalie, and Sarah Jane Shoenfeld. 2021. “Demanding the Vote for Black Majority DC Dr. King’s Home Rule Tour.” Washington History 33(2): 19–23.
- Carey, George W., and James McClellan, eds. 2001. The Federalist. 2nd ed. Indianapolis: Liberty Fund.
- Cheh, Mary M. 2019. “A Proposal to Win the District of Columbia a Partial Vote in the House of Representatives.” University of the District of Columbia Law Review 21(2): 1–18.

- Cobb, Whit. 1995. "Democracy in Search of Utopia: The History, Law, and Politics of Relocating the National Capital." Dickinson Law Review 99(3): 527–611.
- Cooper, Rebecca. 2018. "Far from Home: The Additional Punishment of D.C.'s Out-of-State Detention Policy and Opportunities for Reform Notes." American Criminal Law Review 55(3): 789–812.
- Culbertson, Graham. 2014. "Frederick Douglass's 'Our National Capital': Updating L'Enfant for an Era of Integration." Journal of American Studies 48(4): 911–35.
- Derthick, Martha. 1962. City Politics in Washington, D.C. Cambridge, MA: Joint Center for Urban Studies of Massachusetts Institute of Technology and Harvard University.
- Dilts, Andrew. 2014. Punishment and Inclusion: Race, Membership, and the Limits of American Liberalism. New York: Fordham University Press.
- Douglass, Frederick. 1895. "For District Suffrage. The Meeting Last Night Addressed by Mr. Douglass." The Evening Star, January 22.
- . 1991 [1877]. "Our National Capital." In The Frederick Douglass Papers, ed. John W. Blassingame and John R. McKivigan. Series One, Vol. 4. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- . 1994 [1893]. "Life and Times of Frederick Douglass." In Autobiographies, 453–1045. New York: Library of America.
- Du Bois, W.E.B. 2007 [1920]. Darkwater: Voices from within the Veil. New York: Oxford University Press.
- . 2014 [1935]. Black Reconstruction in America: An Essay toward a History of the Part Which Black Folk Played in the Attempt to Reconstruct Democracy in America, 1860–1880. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Duffey, Denis P. 1995. "The Northwest Ordinance as a Constitutional Document." Columbia Law Review 95(4): 929–68.
- Elliot, Jonathan. 1830. Historical Sketches of the Ten Miles Square Forming the District of Columbia. Washington, DC: J. Elliot, Jr.
- Erman, Sam. 2018. Almost Citizens: Puerto Rico, the U.S. Constitution, and Empire. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Fauntroy, Michael. 2003. Home Rule or House Rule? Congress and the Erosion of Local Governance in the District of Columbia. Lanham, MD: University Press of America.
- Flynn, Meagan, and Michael Brice-Saddler. 2021. "D.C.'s Push to Control Its Own National Guard Takes Big Step Forward." Washington Post, September 4.
- Flynn, Meagan, and Ellie Silverman. 2023. "D.C. Criminal Code Faces Uncertain Future as City Gears up for New Battle." Washington Post, March 10.
- Frymer, Paul. 2017. Building an American Empire: The Era of Territorial and Political Expansion. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- . 2020. "The Politics of D.C. Statehood Follow a Well-Worn Path. Here's Why." Washington Post, July 6.
- Gallagher, Mary A.Y. 1995. "Reinterpreting the 'Very Trifling Mutiny' at Philadelphia in June 1783." Pennsylvania Magazine of History and Biography 119(1/2): 3–35.
- Gold, Martin B. 2018. Senate Procedures and Practice. 4th ed. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.
- Hanna, John. 1951. "Equal Footing in the Admission of States." Baylor Law Review 3(4): 519–38.
- Hanson, Royce, and Harold Wolman. 2023. Nation's Metropolis: The Economy, Politics, and Development of the Washington Region. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Harrison, Robert. 2006. "From Biracial Democracy to Direct Rule: The End of Self-Government in the Nation's Capital, 1865–1878." Journal of Policy History 18 (2): 241–69.
- . 2011. Washington during Civil War and Reconstruction: Race and Radicalism. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Hasen, Richard L. 2024. A Real Right to Vote: How a Constitutional Amendment Can Safeguard American Democracy. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Hatch, Orrin G. 1978. "Should the Capital Vote in Congress? A Critical Analysis of the Proposed D.C. Representation Amendment." Fordham Urban Law Journal 7(3): 479–540.
- Hendriks, Carolyn M., and Richard Reid. 2024. "Shadow Representation: Making Claims to Represent Better Than the Official Representative." Representation 60(4): 685–702.
- Henning, Maye Lan. 2023. "The Empty Gift: Citizenship, Imperialism, and Political Development in Puerto Rico." Studies in American Political Development 37(1): 1–12.
- Hermann, Peter, and Perry Stein. 2024. "Trump Nearly Took over the D.C. Police Force. City Leaders Pushed Back." Washington Post, October 26.
- Holtzman, Abraham. 1986. "Empire and Representation: The U. S. Congress." Legislative Studies Quarterly 11(2): 249–73.
- Horne, Gerald. 2023. Revolt Capital: Racism and Radicalism in Washington, D.C., 1900–2000. New York: International Publishers Company, Incorporated.
- Hudiburg, Jane A. 2022. "Parliamentary Rights of the Delegates and Resident Commissioner from Puerto Rico." R40170. Congressional Research Service.
- Immerwahr, Daniel. 2019. How to Hide an Empire: A History of the Greater United States. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux.

- Ingle, Edward. 1893. The Negro in the District of Columbia. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press.
- Itkowitz, Colby. 2021. "Stacey Plaskett, a House Delegate Who Couldn't Vote to Impeach Trump, Is Using Her Prosecutorial Background to Try to Convict Him." Washington Post, February 11.
- Jarosca, Joseph V., Christopher M. Davis, and Ben Leubsdorf. 2024. "District of Columbia Local Lawmaking and Congressional Authority: In Brief." R47927. Congressional Research Service.
- Jefferson, Thomas. 1952 [1784]. "The Ordinance of 1784, 23 April 1784." In The Papers of Thomas Jefferson, ed. Julian P. Boyd, 6:613–16. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Keeley, James Hugh. 1939. Democracy Or Despotism in the American Capital: A Story of the Growth and Government of the District of Columbia, from the Founding of the Republic to the Adoption of the Organic Act of 1878. Ricardale, MD: Jessie L. Keeley.
- Keyssar, Alexander. 2000. The Right to Vote: The Contested History of Democracy in the United States. New York: Basic Books.
- Kumfer, Timothy. 2024. "It's in Our Hands to Build Our Country in Our Image": Josephine Butler, DC Statehood, and the Everyday Work of Emancipation." Washington History 36(2): 46–59.
- Lester, Joan Steinau. 2003. Eleanor Holmes Norton: Fire in My Soul. New York: Atria Books.
- Lewallen, Jonathan. 2024. "Try, Try Again: Repeat Veto Threats in Presidential-Congressional Bargaining." Congress & the Presidency. <https://doi.org/10.1080/07343469.2024.2379813>
- Lewallen, Jonathan, and Bartholomew Sparrow. 2018. "Nothing on the Floor: Congress, the Territorial Delegates, and Political Representation." Political Science Quarterly 133(4): 729–52.
- López-Santana, Mariely. 2023. "Financial Oversight Boards in the U.S. Federal System: Insights from the Puerto Rican Debt Crisis." Publius: The Journal of Federalism 53 (2): 201–26.
- Maass, Richard W. 2020. The Picky Eagle: How Democracy and Xenophobia Limited U.S. Territorial Expansion. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.
- Mamet, Elliot. 2021. "Representation on the Periphery: The Past and Future of Nonvoting Members of Congress." American Political Thought 10(3): 390–418.
- Mamet, Elliot, and Austin Bussing. 2024. "Race, Democracy, and Empire: Delegates to Congress from DC and the Territories." Polity 56(3): 384–407.
- Manteuffel, Rachel. 2018. "D.C. Shadow Senator Emerges from the Shadows." Washington Post, June 5.
- Masur, Kate. 2010. An Example for All the Land: Emancipation and the Struggle over Equality in Washington, D.C. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.
- McCartney, Robert. 2021. "Perspective: Even the GOP's Three Best Arguments against D.C. Statehood Don't Stand up to Scrutiny." Washington Post, March 29, 2021.
- McCartney, Robert, and Scott Clement. 2019. "Marylanders Narrowly Favor D.C. Statehood, Unlike Americans Overall, According to Post-U. Md. Poll." Washington Post, October 20.
- McCarty, Nolan, Keith T. Poole, and Howard Rosenthal. 2002. "Congress and the Territorial Expansion of the United States." In Party, Process, and Political Change in Congress, ed. David W. Brady and Mathew D. McCubbins, 392–451. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press.
- McLaughlin, Dan. 2020. "The Nation's Capital Should Not Also Be a State." National Review, October 19.
- McMurtry, Virginia A. 1977. "Legislative History of the 23rd Amendment and of Related Efforts to Grant Voting Representation for the District of Columbia in the House of Representatives During the 86th Congress." Congressional Research Service.
- Mintz, Morton. 1960. "House Unit Approves D.C. Suffrage, Limiting Presidential Electors to 3." Washington Post, May 18.
- Moore, Colin D. 2017. American Imperialism and the State, 1893–1921. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Muller, John. 2012. Frederick Douglass in Washington: The Lion of Anacostia. Charleston, South Carolina: The History Press.
- Musgrove, George Derek. 2017. "'Statehood Is Far More Difficult': The Struggle for D.C. Self-Determination, 1980–2017." Washington History 29(2): 3–17.
- Musgrove, George Derek, and Chris Myers Asch. 2021. "Democracy Deferred: Race, Politics, and D.C.'s Two-Century Struggle for Full Voting Rights." Statehood Research DC. <https://perma.cc/2PYX-EZAF>.
- Neale, Thomas H. 2020. "Contingent Election of the President and Vice President by Congress: Perspectives and Contemporary Analysis." R40504. Congressional Research Service.
- Neuman, Gerald L. 1996. "Anomalous Zones Symposium: Surveying Law and Borders." Stanford Law Review 48(5): 1197–234.
- New York Times. 1965. "Economic Freedom for Negroes Stressed by Dr. King in Capital," August 5.
- Norton, Eleanor Holmes. 2022. "Norton Says Lack of Statehood Cost D.C. Tens to Hundreds of Millions of Dollars in Earmarks in Final Fiscal Year 2023 Appropriations Bills." Press Release. December 22. (<https://norton.house.gov/media/press-releases/norton-says-lack-statehood-cost-dc-tens-hundreds-millions-dollars-earmarks>) [<https://perma.cc/DL7E-EF2F>].

- . 2023. “Norton Releases Remarks from ‘Hands Off D.C.’ Rally.” Press Release. March 8. (<http://norton.house.gov/media/press-releases/norton-releases-remarks-hands-dc-rally>) [<https://perma.cc/NYN6-UAN8>].
- Noyes, Theodore W. 1917. “The Presidents and the National Capital.” Records of the Columbia Historical Society, Washington, DC 20:60–113.
- . 1951. Our National Capital and Its Un-Americanized Americans. Washington, DC: Judd & Detweiler.
- Nteta, Tatishe M., Jesse H. Rhodes, Gregory Wall, Katherine L. Dixon-Gordon, Raymond J. La Raja, Brian Lickel, Andrea Mah, et al. 2023. “Rooted in Racism? Race, Partisanship, Status Threat, and Public Opinion Toward Statehood for Washington, D.C.” Political Research Quarterly 76(3): 1486–501.
- Otten, Tori. 2023. “Eleanor Holmes Norton Has Some Words for Joe Biden and the Democratic Party on D.C.’s Crime Bill.” New Republic, March 8. (<https://newrepublic.com/post/171043/eleanor-holmes-norton-words-joe-biden-democratic-party-dc-crime-law>) [<https://perma.cc/F59W-W8WU>].
- Pearlman, Lauren. 2019. Democracy’s Capital: Black Political Power in Washington, D.C., 1960s–1970s. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.
- Piper, Ada G. 1944. “The Political Activities of the Negro in the Territorial Government of Washington, 1871–1874.” Master’s Thesis. Washington, DC: Howard University.
- Portnoy, Jenna, Ellie Silverman, and Meagan Flynn. 2023. “Senate Votes to Reject D.C. Criminal Code Bill.” Washington Post, March 9.
- Raskin, Jamin. 1999. “Is This America? The District of Columbia and the Right to Vote.” Harvard Civil Rights-Civil Liberties Law Review 34:39–97.
- . 2014. “Democratic Capital: A Voting Rights Surge in Washington Could Strengthen the Constitution for Everyone.” William & Mary Bill of Rights Journal 23(1): 47–63.
- Raven-Hansen, Peter. 1975. “Congressional Representation for the District of Columbia: A Constitutional Analysis.” Harvard Journal on Legislation 12(2): 167–93.
- Remini, Robert V. 2006. The House: The History of the House of Representatives. New York: Smithsonian Books.
- Richards, Mark David. 2004. “The Debates over the Retrocession of the District of Columbia, 1801–2004.” Washington History 16(1): 54–82.
- Riker, William H. 1964. Federalism: Origin, Operation, Significance. Boston: Little, Brown and Company.
- Samuels, Robert. 2023. “The War on Cities.” The New Yorker, August 4. (<https://www.newyorker.com/news/annals-of-crime/the-war-on-cities>) [<https://perma.cc/G2ST-CL5J>].
- Schwartz, Mainon A. 2022. “DC Statehood: Constitutional Considerations for Proposed Legislation.” R47101. Congressional Research Service.
- Shklar, Judith N. 1991. American Citizenship: The Quest for Inclusion. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Smith, Jason A. 2023. Constitution, Jefferson’s Manual, and Rules of the House of Representatives of the United States, 118th Congress. Washington, DC: Government Printing Office.
- Smith, Sam. 1974. Captive Capital: Colonial Life in Modern Washington. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Somin, Ilya. 2020. Free to Move: Foot Voting, Migration, and Political Freedom. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Sommers, Kyla. 2023. When the Smoke Cleared: The 1968 Rebellions and the Unfinished Battle for Civil Rights in the Nation’s Capital. New York: The New Press.
- Sparrow, Bartholomew. 2017. “A Territorial State: Geographic Expansion, the US Territories, and an ‘Introduction to American Politics.’” PS: Political Science & Politics 50(2): 492–96.
- Stewart, Charles, and Barry R. Weingast. 1992. “Stacking the Senate, Changing the Nation: Republican Rotten Boroughs, Statehood Politics, and American Political Development.” Studies in American Political Development 6(2): 223–71.
- Story, Joseph. 1873. Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States: With a Preliminary Review of the Constitutional Histories of the Colonies and States Before the Adoption of the Constitution. 4th ed. Vol. 3. Boston: Little, Brown and Company.
- Terrell, Mary Church. 1907. “What It Means to Be Colored in the Capital of the United States.” The Independent, January 24.
- Thompson, Douglas I. 2019. “An Ill-Fitting Coat: Reforming US Political Boundaries for a Metropolitan Age.” Journal of Politics 81(1): 246–59.
- Thornell, Joan Talbert. 1990. “Governance of the Nation’s Capital: A Summary History of the Forms and Powers of Local Government for the District of Columbia, 1970 to 1973.” Committee on the District of Columbia, U.S. House of Representatives. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office.
- Tiebout, Charles M. 1956. “A Pure Theory of Local Expenditures.” Journal of Political Economy 64(5): 416–24.
- Treul, Sarah A. 2017. Agenda Crossover: The Influence of State Delegations in Congress. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Weare, Neil. 2017. “Equally American: Amending the Constitution to Provide Voting Rights in

- U.S. Territories and the District of Columbia.” Stetson Law Review 46(2): 259–94.
- Whyte, James H. 1958. The Uncivil War; Washington during the Reconstruction, 1865–1878. New York: Twayne Publishers.
- Wilson, James. (1787) 1993. “James Wilson’s Speech at a Public Meeting, Philadelphia, October 6, 1787.” In The Debate on the Constitution: Federalist and Antifederalist Speeches, Articles, and Letters during the Struggle over Ratification, ed. Bernard Bailyn, 1:63–69. New York: Library of America.
- Wilson, James Lindley. 2019. Democratic Equality. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Wirls, Daniel. 2021. The Senate: From White Supremacy to Governmental Gridlock. Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press.
- Woodward-Burns, Robinson. 2021. “Is the Two-Century Battle for D.C. Statehood Finally near an End?” Washington Post, March 23.
- Zets, Serena. 2023. “Hands Off DC Is Organizing on Behalf of the District, in Resistance to Congress.” Washington City Paper. July 28. (<http://washingtoncitypaper.com/article/616796/hands-off-dc-is-organizing-on-behalf-of-the-district-in-resistance-to-congress/>) [<https://perma.cc/FXT9-AMV5>].