

From this date until his retirement in 1887 he directed the affairs of both institutions, and many and great were the changes he had been an eye-witness to during his long tenure of office.

When he originally undertook the management of the old Asylum at Forston, the "staples and chains" of by-gone days were in several rooms, though he was assured they had not been used for many years.

From his earliest asylum days he was a strong advocate of non-restraint, though not to the degree he was enabled to witness in the happy years of his retirement. As an administrator he had few equals, and those who knew him best will ever bear witness to his singularly clear judgment and well-balanced mind. Above everything he was punctual and methodical in all his ways and habits—qualities which cannot be shorn from the successful administrator.

His fine commanding presence, his massive head, his soft silken hair showing far below his well-known broad-brimmed hat, made him a very conspicuous figure; and when to all this is added an individuality of wonderful sympathy and tenderness, it is easy to understand the great hold he acquired over those who came under his sway. It was during his years of greatest activity that the late Lord Shaftesbury offered him a Commissionership in Lunacy, which on private grounds he felt himself unable to accept.

When in 1886 he intimated his desire to be relieved from the arduous labours of his office, the Committee of Visitors awarded him the fullest pension it was in their power to grant, but through an unworthy opposition this was not adopted by the Court of Quarter Sessions, and he had the humiliation of having his thirty-two years of ceaseless toil and devoted services rewarded by a pension altogether unworthy of his claims.

Mr. Symes was one of the few remaining links between the past and the present in our own special branch of the profession. He was the intimate friend of the late Dr. Sherlock of Worcester, Dr. McCulloch of Abergavenny, Sir John Bucknill, and Dr. Thurnam, of Devizes. He lived to see the original home of his asylum labours torn asunder and every brick removed, also to see the bare chalk down on which he spent so much personal labour grow into a huge estate of 400 acres with a large modern asylum surrounded with avenues, trees, and shrubberies of great beauty and perfection.

He was retiring almost to a fault, which prevented him from being better known, either amongst his profession or the general community. Two bereavements, one in 1863 and the other in 1891, greatly affected him. The former was the loss of his first wife, for whom no words could describe his love and attachment, and the other was the death of his second son, when an Assistant Medical Officer at Rainhill Asylum.

He leaves a widow and four children to mourn his loss, and never were children the poorer for the loss of a parent, for he was indeed the most loving and affectionate of fathers.
