In the face of his illness, he remained personally and professionally active and productive until his death. The stimulation of his ideas and insights, his zestful love of life and sense of humor will be missed, but they enriched the lives of the many people with whom he was in touch.

John P. Green

We are saddened to announce the death of our colleague John P. Green on July 3, 1986. John had been a professor of political science at Texas Southern University since 1969. He took his M.A. and Ph.D. at the University of Chicago where he wrote his dissertation on John Locke under the supervision of Leo Strauss.

John not only taught moral and political philosophy but he also lived by it. He was deeply respected by faculty and students alike. His classes were in high demand, and he always made a special effort to make himself available to students. He was also a leader of the faculty. As a result of his efforts, tenure was extended to over half the faculty at Texas Southern. In his earlier years, he contributed greatly to the racial integration effort in New Orleans and Houston. Here in Houston he was active in community affairs and had served as president of his neighborhood association for several years.

In the last few years he had been researching and writing a book on the seventeenth century English thinker Henry Parker.

His erudition and compassion will be missed by all he helped. His dedication to the public service and the "polis" will be hard to replace.

Carl A. McCandless

Carl A. McCandless, Professor Emeritus of Political Science at Washington University, St. Louis, died suddenly on December 31, 1986. He was 79.

Born in Lincoln, Missouri, Carl served as a public school teacher there, and as a high school principal, and later superintendent of two public school systems in Iowa. A graduate of Central Missouri State College, he received a master's degree from the University of Missouri in 1932 and a doctorate in political science from the State University of Iowa in 1942. That year, he joined the department of political science at Washington University, where he taught in the fields of public administration and urban and state government until his retirement thirty years later. He served as chairman of the department from 1960-66.

Carl McCandless was known throughout Missouri as an expert on problems of state and local government. His Government, Politics and Administration in Missouri (1949) was standard, and he was active as a consultant to many municipalities in the St. Louis area. In 1954-55, Carl served as research director of the Missouri State Administrative Reorganization Commission, and his work there led directly to substantial improvement in Missouri budgetary and financial procedures.

Carl McCandless was best known in the profession for his Urban Government and Politics (1970). He was, in addition, an active participant in professional associations, serving as president of the Missouri Political Science Association early in its history. For us at Washington University his most important role was as chair of our department for six critical years. His sound judgment and extraordinary good sense contributed more than his great modesty ever allowed him fully to appreciate to the emergence of a department that was both intellectually lively and personally congenial. Throughout Washington University as well, Carl's monumental integrity, coupled with exceptional sensitivity to the needs of others, made him a deeply respected figure whose counsel was both sought
