

ABOUT THE AUTHORS

BURTON M. ATKINS is Professor and Chair, Department of Political Science, Florida State University. His articles on judicial decisionmaking and appellate courts have appeared in a variety of social science journals. His current research involves a cross-national study of Anglo-American appellate courts.

JOHN J. DONOHUE III is a Research Fellow at the American Bar Foundation and a Professor of Law at Northwestern University. He has written a number of papers that explore the empirical validity of the Coase theorem. He is currently evaluating the effects of federal civil rights policy on the economic welfare of blacks and women, as well as studying employment discrimination cases in the federal courts.

JASON SCOTT JOHNSTON is Associate Professor of Law at Vanderbilt University. His published articles apply ideas from game theory and the economics of information to analyze issues in contract and tort law. His current research focuses both on the game-theoretic analysis of legal rules and institutions and on the theory of legal explanation.

DAVID H. KAYE is a Regents Professor at Arizona State University, where he also has served as director of the Center for the Study of Law, Science and Technology. He is coauthor of Health Care Law, Forensic Science and Public Policy, 4th ed. (Boston: Little, Brown, 1990), McCormick on Evidence, 3d ed. (St. Paul, MN: West Publishing, 1984), and an editor of Statistical Methods in Discrimination Litigation (New York: Marcel Dekker, 1986).

RAYMOND PATERNOSTER is Associate Professor in the Institute of Criminal Justice and Criminology at the University of Maryland at College Park. His recent interests include empirical tests of criminological theory, juror attitudes in capital cases, and the relationship between past and future criminality.

MICHAEL J. SAKS is Professor of Law at the University of Iowa. A social psychologist, he recently won the American Psychological Association's award for Distinguished Contributions to Psychology in the Public Interest. His work has touched on a variety of aspects of decisionmaking in the legal process (judges, juries, rulemakers, etc.), and his current interests focus on the role of data in policymaking concerning the litigation system and the law's use of scientific evidence.

PETER SIEGELMAN is a Research Fellow at the American Bar Foundation. He has written on the economics of tort in cases of latent injury and on insurance industry antitrust litigation. His current work is on the causes and consequences of employment discrimination litigation and on discrimination in negotiating for new car purchases.

DOUGLAS A. SMITH is Associate Professor in the Institute of Criminal Justice and Criminology at the University of Maryland at College Park. He received his Ph.D. degree in sociology from Indiana University in 1982 and is completing a term as Editor-in-Chief of Criminology. His recent research interests include statistical and theoretical implications of the criminal career paradigm, racial disparity in juvenile justice processing, and issues in the analysis of panel data.

CASSIA SPOHN is Professor of Criminal Justice at the University of Nebraska at Omaha. She has written a number of articles on racial disparity in sentencing and on the factors that influence judges' sentencing decisions. She and Julie Horney are currently working on a nationally funded study of the impact of rape law reform.
