

ABOUT THE AUTHORS

RICHARD L. ABEL is Professor of Law at the University of California, Los Angeles. He edited volumes eleven and twelve of this journal and has written widely on dispute institutions, torts, and the legal profession. He currently is completing monographs on the English and American legal professions and is editing, with P.S.C. Lewis, three volumes of essays on the comparative sociology of legal professions, to be published by the University of California Press in 1987 under the title Lawyers in Society: A Comparative Approach.

BARBARA A. CURRAN is Associate Executive Director and a Research Attorney at the American Bar Foundation (ABF). She was Project Director of the ABF study compiling statistics on the U.S. lawyer population of 1980. She is presently directing a study developing statistics for the 1985 lawyer population. Her other research work has dealt with delivery of legal services. She is presently developing a study of changes in attitudes and perceptions about lawyers and legal services in light of relaxation of rules regulating the practice of law.

WILLIAM L. F. FELSTINER is Senior Behavioral Scientist at the Institute for Civil Justice, Rand Corporation, Santa Monica.

JOHN GRIFFITHS is Professor of Sociology of Law at the University of Groningen, the Netherlands, and editor-in-chief of the Journal of Legal Pluralism. His current major interests are in litigation theory and research, legal pluralism, and the (mostly nonproblematic) use of "law" in mundane interactions.

TERENCE C. HALLIDAY is a Project Director at the American Bar Foundation and Visiting Assistant Professor in the Department of Sociology, University of Chicago. He writes on the sociology of legal and other professions. His book Beyond Monopoly: State Crisis and Professional Empowerment will be published by the University of Chicago Press in 1986.

P.S.C. LEWIS is a Research Fellow of All Souls College, Oxford University. He has been Chairman of the Working Group for the Comparative Study of Legal Professions of the Research Committee of the Sociology of Law and, with Richard L. Abel, is currently editing the results of the group's work—three volumes of national and comparative essays on lawyers, to be published by the University of California Press in 1987 under the title Lawyers in Society: A Comparative Approach. He also edited, with Robert Dingwall, The Sociology of the Professions: Lawyers, Doctors and Others (1983).

AUSTIN SARAT is Professor of Political Science at Amherst College. He has published articles on the emergence and transformation of disputes, access to justice, and the costs of civil litigation. He is currently studying lawyer-client interaction, the transmission of legal ideology, and the generation and processing of product liability and mass injury litigation.
