

1. Exchange Systems in Prehistory

Edited by TIMOTHY EARLE and JONATHON ERICSON

A Volume in the STUDIES IN ARCHEOLOGY Series

Exchange Systems in Prehistory offers a wealth of significant methodological and theoretical approaches to archaeological research on trade. The papers collected in this volume present the advanced techniques of interdisciplinary research that include the chemical characterization of raw materials, the descriptive modeling of distribution patterns, the application of ethnographic and ethnohistorical research, and the development of systemic models of exchange. Each paper introduces an analytical approach and then demonstrates how it is rendered operational in a specific research program. The substantive areas of research range from California hunters and gatherers to Oceanic and Southwest U.S. horticulturalists to the civilizations of Mesoamerica and the Old World.

2. For Theory Building in Archaeology

ESSAYS ON FAUNAL REMAINS, AQUATIC RESOURCES, SPATIAL ANALYSIS, AND SYSTEMIC MODELING

Edited by LEWIS R. BINFORD

A Volume in the STUDIES IN ARCHEOLOGY Series

In order to build a theory it is reasoned that subject areas about which strong uniformitarian assumptions may be warranted are apt to be those most productively researched. Three such subject areas are emphasized in this book: (1) faunal analysis both terrestrial and marine, (2) the study of the organized use of space, and (3) the study of organizations or systems themselves.

It is also reasoned that propositions of general theory must be related to general conditions of the human experience. Clearly, all men must relate to their environments, organize their behavior in spatial terms, and effect some organized social behavior. Therefore, as potential theorists, we may profitably seek sophisticated knowledge about environments, environmental processes and dynamics, and spatial, structural, and social systems properties. The studies in this book seek such understanding—in subject areas which may be expected to exhibit organized properties, independently of man's behavior, as a basis for developing reference dimensions for both evaluating and anticipating human behavior.

3. Hillforts

LATER PREHISTORIC EARTHWORKS IN BRITAIN AND IRELAND

Edited by D. W. HARDING

Hillforts, in great variety, are among the most common prehistoric monuments in Britain. This volume elucidates two problems of hillforts—one of chronology, the other of definition and function—and discusses the function of the hillfort in Bronze and Iron Age societies. It includes an introductory essay which will be of value to students and beginners in the field, describes the results of individual excavations, and surveys regional hillfort studies. Much of the material on individual excavations has not previously been published and at least two chapters contain the only reports that will appear on those particular excavations.

4. Research Strategies in Historical Archeology

Edited by STANLEY SOUTH

A Volume in the STUDIES IN ARCHEOLOGY Series

From the Foreword:

The major intended effect of this book is to place historical archaeology squarely inside anthropology. In its own terms this book is successful and by comparison with what we think of as the best products of the past fifteen years, it is yet more successful. In order to shift historical archaeology from its particularistic to a scientific or anthropological foundation a large batch of methods and techniques have been used by these authors, sometimes with awesome sophistication. These include . . . statistics, hypothesis testing, and systems theory.

. . . These essays fulfill all their own claims and expectations; they also provide analyses of data fascinating in their own right. This is of course as it should be, but beside this there are a number of other advantages to be derived from this book that are not so expectable and which come as delightful surprises. Among them we are given a tacit reappraisal of what archaeology is all about.—Mark P. Leone

5. Archaeological Approaches to the Present

MODELS FOR RECONSTRUCTING THE PAST

By JOHN E. YELLEN

A Volume in the STUDIES IN ARCHEOLOGY Series

Lying at the boundary between archaeology and ethnography, Archaeological Approaches to the Present investigates the relationship between these two closely related disciplines in an attempt to determine how ethnographic data may be used to understand the past and how the archaeologist's unique perspective of time can elucidate the "ethnographic present." In particular it questions whether a specific ethnographic case, the !Kung hunter-gatherers, a San or Bushman people of Southern Africa—can serve to illuminate the more general human past.

Drawing on extensive fieldwork, the author first examines long-term, large scale population movements, then considers the placement of camps, and finally focuses on activities carried out within specific campsites. Three large appendices and a series of 16 detailed maps of individual !Kung camps provide an extremely rich body of controlled data, enabling the interested scholar or student to formulate his own hypotheses and test them against a wealth of descriptive data.

FOSSIL EVIDENCE:

The Human Evolutionary Journey

An up-to-date synthesis of hominid evolution, this text offers your students a living history of the hominid fossil record and explores the populations of these individuals, their behavior, and their social organization. Excellent illustrations, almost double the number in the previous edition, include photographs of the sites Dr. Poirier visited in Africa. Topics include: pongid evolution; the development of bipedalism; Ramapithecus; lower Pleistocene hominids; and more!

By Frank E. Poirier, Ohio State University. January, 1977. 2nd edition, 342 pages plus FM I-XIV, 7" x 10", 241 illustrations. Price, $7.95.

15 YEARS OF EXPERIENCE

AN ARCHAEOLOGICAL PERSPECTIVE

By LEWIS R. BINFORD

A Volume in the STUDIES IN ARCHEOLOGY Series

Graduate and advanced undergraduate students will find this volume a valuable reference source and guide to the concepts and methods of the new archaeology. The book brings together for the first time the articles of Lewis R. Binford, one of the most controversial and influential figures in modern archaeology. These papers—four of them previously unpublished—were all written during the past ten years and reflect Binford's development of an explicit scientific approach to archaeological research.

The book is divided into four sections

—Method and Archaeological Reasoning, Method of Data Collection, Theory and Assumptions, and Analysis—each of them introduced in a short essay by Professor Binford. He covers a variety of topics from historical site materials through the Acheulian era of over 400,000 years ago—yet integrates them all into a theoretical-methodological framework that treats archaeology as a true anthropological discipline, and not simply as artifact history.

DATING METHODS IN ARCHAEOLOGY

By JOSEPH W. MICHELS

A Volume in the STUDIES IN ARCHEOLOGY Series

This volume offers an up-to-date, comprehensive treatment of the principal methods, techniques, and strategies of archaeological dating. The author takes the reader step by step from the initial phase of sample recovery to the final determination of age, covering such basic techniques as archaeological phasing, relative dating, and chronometric dating. He presents a detailed description of each method or technique—covering the underlying scientific principles, laboratory procedures, instrumentation, and archaeological applications. He reviews the assets and liabilities of each method, and shows the reader how to determine the accuracy and reliability of his results. Each chapter includes an extensive list of references for the reader who wishes to delve further into a particular method.

Dating Methods in Archaeology will serve as a valuable text for courses in archaeological dating and methods, as well as an ancillary text for courses in anthropology, ancient history, art history, the classics, and geology. Amateur archaeologists throughout the world will find it a most useful handbook.

THE AZTECS, MAYA, AND THEIR PREDECESSORS ARCHAEOLOGY OF MESOAMERICA

By MURIEL PORTER WEAVER

A Volume in the STUDIES IN ARCHEOLOGY Series

The Aztecs, Maya, and their predecessors established one of the highest civilizations of the New World in that area of Mexico and Guatemala known as Mesoamerica. After describing the land and its natural endowments, the book traces the rise of this civilization from the settlement by man in the late Pleistocene times until the conquest of Mexico by the Spanish in 1521. It is the only book to cover all of Mesoamerica—including the Aztecs, Maya, and many lesser groups—in one volume. It contains an abundance of illustrative material, including line drawings, maps, charts, plates, and photograph, and is an ideal text for a one semester upper level undergraduate course on Mesoamerican archaeology.
